Buenos Aires junta says 'disappeared' are all dead

From Andrew Thompson, Montevide

Argentina's military govern-ment yesterday issued its "finaldocument on the war against subversion and terrorism". It declared that the "disappeared" people should be considered legally dead, and signalled official protection for members of the security forces involved in "excesses" during the country to the security forces in the security force ter-insurgency campaign.

Mr Winston Churchill, Con-servative MP for Stretford, yesterday dismissed as rubbish and without foundation charges Monsignor Bruce Kent, general secretary of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarma-ment, that he was linked with people trying to smear CND.

Mgr Kent has accused the Coalition for Peace through Security, a group run by three Security, a group run by unex-conservative prospective candi-dates, of sending spies to CND's offices, telling lies about CND and claiming he had organized an IRA march.

He said: "These people meet Winston Churchill once a week. do not know who orchestrates the campaign. The Government has presented us as being led by left-wing Marxist groups". Mr Churchill said: "I would be glad to know of Mgr Kent's evidence, and I challenge him to meetings with nobody". He was chairman of the Campaign for Defence and Muluiateral Disarmament, he said, a group of four Conservative MPs which met monthly with two officials from Conservative Central Office. He also headed the Committee for Peace with Freedom. That met every three months in his flat. Its members included Lady Olga Maitland, who runs Women for Defence, Lord Chalfont, Mr Norris McWhirter, Mr Ken Aldred of the British Atlantic Committee's offshoot, Peace through Nato, General Sir Harry Tuzo, and Mr Edward Leigh of the Coalition for Peace through Security, which oper-ates from an office in Whitehall. Mr Churchill said: "I am not a member of the Coalition for Peace through Security and I do not take part in any of their deliberations.

"The aub of Bruce Kent's complaint against them is that they exercise their democratic rights in a free society to go along to CND's meetings and ask awkward questions. One can appreciate that he gets a bit exasperated.
"He is seeking to smear me and my colleagues in the Conservative Party by alleging a smear campaign. I have never encouraged anyone directly or indirectly to indulge in a smear campaign."

Mgr Kent said that apart from meeting the coalition, which he desribed as the most offensive, aggressive and unjust group around, Mr Churchill goes in for this sort of thing independently", claiming, for example, that CND never spoke about Soviet weapons, which was untrue.

Mr Churchill's Committee for Peace with Freedom has been involved in controversy before. Mr Alan Lee Williams, chairman of the executive of the British Atlantic Committee,

Heath accuses Fleet Street

Mr Edward Heath last night accused a number of Fleet Street newspapers of a con-spiracy to ruin his relations with the Royal Family and to publicly discredit him. The former Prime Minister missed a 7.03 pm Commons vote on the Fmance Bill on Wednesday because police held up traffic in Parliament Street to give the Queen Mother clear access through to a City engagement, despite their obli-

The Prime Minister yesterday visited Kedleston Hall, home of the third Viscount Scarsdale and one of Britain's most amous historic homes, the future of which hangs in the balance because of a valueadded-tax ruling.

Although on a private visit organized by the local Con-servative Party, Mrs Thatcher is expected to take the opportunity to consider the threat to the future of what is considered to be Robert Adam's finest masterpiece.

Her visit comes shortly efore a meeting on May 17 on the VAT ruling between Sir Geoffrey Howe, Chancellor of the Exchequer, and a delegation from the heritage lobby led by Sir Arthur Drew, chairman of the Museums and Galleries

Lord Scarsdale has said he is reconsidering whether to offer about £2m worth of Kedleston's art treasures to the nation in lieu of taxes, because at present, sales of works of art which have been on show to the public are tiable for VAT.

He would have to pay about £300,000 in tax to the customs and excise. Condemning the that he "might have to do another Mentmore and sell off the whole lot of art treasures". He and other owners of historic houses are pressing for works of art on show to the public not to be treated as assets of a business but to be zero rated for VAT purposes.

Some form of breakthrough is vital, not only for the political reputation of Mr Shultz who has been just nine months in the job and has recently come under criticism, but also for the reputation of the Reagan Administration's foreign policy

The American delegation is already believed to have transmitted a pessimistic assessment to the White House of the chances of success for the mission. These have combined with leaks about Mr Shultz's initial reluctance to go on the mission to provide a general mood of despondency.

These private reflections have been countered by public statements of hope and goodwill, although the optimism of the first stage of the mission in Egypt quickly wore off. Yester-cay, the most Mr Shultz could of "an inch or maybe an inch

Video pirates face two year sentences

COMMONS

The Copyright (Amendment) Bill. which is designed to stop the trade in pirate video material, was read the third time in the Commons. The Bill provides that manufacturers or importers of material made in temporters of mineral made in breach of the copyright can be fined up to £1,000 on summary convic-tion or face an unlimited fine and up to two years' imprisonment on conviction in a higher court. These who sell or hire out pirate videos face a fine of £1,000.

Sir John Eden (Bournemouth. West. The international aspects of this traffic were one of its most serious features. Many of these films were first made in the United States. It was not surprising that the American interests were watching carefully the progress of this legislation.

The fact that this trade was being carried out was largely due to the extent of public demand. It was tempting for people to buy a copy of a video cassette for a price cheaper it for hire or sale. They were the than what the legitimate copy would cost, but it was wrong that, wittingly or unwittingly, they should be encouraging illegal activity.

He hoped that the passage of this He noped that the passage of this Bill would reinforce the work being done by all those concerned to stop this crime. He hoped it would help to emphasize to members of the public generally that they should have no part of it.

This was an interim measure. What was urgently needed was the outcome of the Government's outcome of the Government's comprehensive review of copyright law. He hoped they would soon be in a position to be able to consider a new copyright Bill brought forward by the Government which would deal with all aspects of the infringement of copyright.

Pope calls for release of Solidarity prisoners

The Pope is understood to have urged the Polish Govern-ment to release all political prisoners before he visits his homeland in June, thus adding substantial weight to church calls for an amnesty.

Church sources say that the Pope's message had been relayed to the authorities but so far there is no sign of a reaction. Several hundred Solidarity sympathizers are still in prison for martial law offences, such as organizing strikes, and the church has been trying to use the leverage of the papal visit to gain concessions on their behalf.

Some form of concession though probably not a general amnesty - is likely but the Government wants first to ride out the expected demonstrations on May Day and May 3, for they will give some token of the strength of the Solidarity opposition.

Tomorrow, May Day, has been portrayed as by the Government as a crucial test of strength with the underground. with the authorities determined to show Poland's neighbours that limited political and Government report blaming the economic reforms will not open up a new Pandora's box of

The underground for its part does not really view May Day as a major confrontation but rather as a peaceful aternative procession, similar to that staged last year. The Government has banned alcohol sales over the next few days, party cells have been briefed about the "opposition challenge", and the Govern-ment has approached the church and asked it to call for restraint from the population in the next few days.

The underground processions are due to begin after a Mass in the old town of Warsaw - and elsewhere in Poland - and will this coincide with an official Communist march to be held only yards away Mr Kazimierz Barcicowaki the Politburo member who sits on the Church-State Commission, has asked the church to postpone the morning Mass due tomorrow to avoid confrontation. Nakasone cultivates his Asian neighbours

Tokye When Mr Yasuhiro Nakasone, Japan's Prime Minister, took office last November, after a battle for power within the ruling Liberal Democratic Party, he made a point of telephoning personal greetings to, among others, a number of leaders in Asia.

This was an unprecedented piece of public relations for an incoming Japanese prime min-ister. Though seemingly a minor gesture, the courtesy calls signalled the start of what was to be an impressive - by past Japanese standards - round of 'personal" diplomacy, helping to smooth the way for Mr Nakasone's latest initiative, his first official tour of South-East Asia, starting today.

He scored remarkably high marks in the United States, Japan's most important ally, during his first official visit in January. He arrived in Washington having managed first to repair badly-strained ties with South Korea during an historic trip to Seoul, the first since post-war relations were

What's new

Next week sees the first issue of yet another SDP-Liberal Alliance publishing venture. The monthly New Democrat incorporates the former Alliance magazine and attempts to replace the fortnightly Democrat, which ceased publication at the beginning of February. Democrat has left its chairman, Michael Golder, SDP candidate for Glouces ter and chairman of the Kennedy Brookes catering chain, struggling to pay off a swathe of debts, though it started by offering an editorial salary so large that even PHS was tempted to apply (and John Torode of The Guardian, briefly, to accept the job). New Democrat will be much more parsimonious, sharing offices and printers with two small music magazines, Black Music and Blues and Soul. Its editors, Christopher Layton, formerly of Alliance, and Richard Lamb, who used to run the Liberal New Outlook, work as volunteers and Lamb tells me: "About £25 per thousand words will be top pay for anybody".

The countryside debate: conservation v subsidized surpluses

Must the taxpayer be milked?

Send the farmer back to market

The main purpose of taking money away from the taxpayer and giving it to the farmer was, we were told when the system began in 1947, to keep people employed on the land. Since then, two things have happened: the number of farmers and farm workers has more than halved and the burden on the taxpayer of supporting those who survived has about doubled in real terms. In cash terms, the cost of agricultural support is 20 times more than it was

As the number of farmers declines, and the cost of supporting them mounts, it seems painfully obvious that the system is not working. On too of that, the steady transformation of our countryside, making ever larger parts of our rural counties look like Manitoba or Indiana, is beginning to make the taxpayer wonder whether he is getting value for his millions.

seems to be eating as expensively as anyone in the world. It comes as rather a shock, for example, to sit down in a restaurant in New York and find the prices so much lower than in London

Yet farmers have been the saddest casualties. Most of the half who have been forced out have been small livestock farmers who were never a burden on the taxpayer. It can be shown clearly that those who have left farming seldom got much out of the taxpayer at all; and as it is taxpayers' money that is reshaping the pattern of British farming and keeping careful watch on their new editor, Sir Larry Lamb. Twenty years ago as humble Albana and changing the sight and sounds of the countryside, it follows naturally that modern farming is becoming more dependent upon the largesse of the rest of us. It is also being made increasingly inefficient, if the badge of an efficient business is its ability to trade profitably without public subsidy.

> A political decision has been made that we should grow ever more wheat and other cereals, when both our soil and our climate make it impossible to grow them as Holland with Boston.

cheaply and efficiently as other countries. Last week I was in the United States and flew over some of the 83 million acres now being "set aside". It is an area twice the size of the UK's total farmland, and all of it is now to lie fallow. Yet the soil and the climate is almost perfect for the growing of wheat, maize and other grains, at about half the cost here. The British consumer (including the dairy farmer and the pig and poultry producer) has not indicated a refusal to buy this grain. Instead, a political decision has been made to tax it so heavily, when it enters a British port, that only a limited quantity comes in. Further support is given to the arable farmer in the form of an export subsidy. As our wheat costs nearly twice as much to produce as that in the United States, the subsidy has to be almost as much as the world price itself. So much of our wheat has been exported this winter as a result that we are now running into a shortage, despite last year's record harvest. It means that this week our livestock producers are being told that the price of animal feed will have to go up yet again. And this year, like last year and every year for the past decade, 2,000 or more of them will go out of business.

This political control over our food market ill serves the farmer, as it does the consumer and taxpayer. One remedy is at hand: to set up a royal commission, comprising some of the clearest brains in the country and farmers' representatives, and invite them to consider whether there is a case for giving taxpayers' money to support agriculture and, if so, how that support should be

The conclusion might well be that the present system should be dismantled altogether, that the consumer should be allowed to buy the food of first choice, and the only coerced into paying money to farmers is to protect and conserve the countryside. The latter task could then be entrusted to the Department of the Environment, which would do the opposite to what the Ministry of Agriculture has been doing for nearly 40 years.

Richard Body The author is Conservative MP for

Wanted: a better spread of money

The iniquities of the "voluntary" system of wild life conservation introduced by the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 - in reality a system of expensive bribes to try to persuade a few lucky farmers to protect a small number of select sites could be ended by extending the system we use to control anti-social development in urban areas. Planning controls, with no compensation if developments are prevented in the public interest, should be extended to cover major agricultural and forestry developments. But we will still be left with the present crazy system where tiny amounts of taxpayers' money available for conservation are pitted against the huge sums taxpayers are also providing for agriculture.

One answer to this would be simply to stop providing subsidies or support for farming, leaving us free to import food on world markets, and allowing market forces to determine the price our own farmers receive for their produce. The result would be disastrous for British agriculture, and for the British countryside. We are now so far down the road of capital intensive, industrial farming that only the biggest and richest farmers would survive. In the uplands agriculture would more or less come to an end, and the lowlands would be dominated by a few huge ago-businesses. This isn't what conservationists (or the Labour Party) want. We need more people working in the countryside, to care for it and revitalize the rural

The answer is to maintain the agriculture, but to spend the money very differently. How this could be done is detailed in a report by Clive Potter, Investing in Rural Harmony, available from the World Wildlife

Briefly, an alternative system of agricultural support would aim to continue support for food production on land already intensively farmed, but a number of new objectives would be added. Support would be used to create new jobs, to encourage traditional farming in areas where this is important for wildlife or the landscape, to give more help to small, poor and part-time farmers, and less to the big and rich.

Instead of promoting policies diametrically opposed to conservation, agricultural support would promote a reasonable level of food production, while integrating conservation into the day-to-day management of every farm.

Money would be saved by spending far less on grants for capital investment - investment in land improvement is the source of much of the present conflict in the countryside. Some capital expenditure - subject to much more rigorous scrutiny - would continue to be grant-aided, for example improvements in drainage for land already intensively farmed. The system of farm development plans - already in use - should be extended to include a much broader view of the type of development qualifying for support, to include support for conservation on the farm, and to include a much wider range of farms.

Current efforts to reduce the price of cereals relative to livestock would continue, but overall, price support should play a less significant role, with more farmers being influenced by a more finely-tuned grant-aid system. Controls on the level of production of some products could be extended.

Finally, the system of headage payments on livestock should be modified, and extended. The modifications would include an upper limit on payments - our current open-ended payments are encouraging false economies of scale and thereby the destruction of small farms, particularly in the uplands. Conditions on stocking densities are

A passionate insight into the master's mind

Bernard Levin: the way we live now

There is an ancient Chinese proverb which runs "If the very leader-writers are going to get in on the act, what will be left for the poor columnists?" For I, too, have been to Alfred Brender's series of seven recitals at the Queen Elizabeth Hall, and I, too, have something to say on the subject. Let us see whether there is enough to go round; somehow, I rather think there will be.

When Brendel played all the Beethoven sonatas last, in 1977, it was an experience that far tran-scended its qualities as interpretation or even as music; the 32 sonatas comprise an exploration of art and its function so wide, deep and complex that it is almost impossible to believe that it is not a single, comprehensive statement, composed in one sustained burst of unimaginably fierce creative energy.

The feeling that the 32 formed a coherent and consciously inter-connected whole was derived from Brendel's playing, which built the whole series into just such a statement; each sonata, though true to itself, took its place in the complex family tree of Beethoven's keyboard works. And now Brendel has done it again; the series has just finished.

Note first the venue; the Queen Elizabeth Hall has been packed to its hideous concrete walls for evey programme, and on arrival each time I have found an immense queue on the stairs praying fervently for somebody's Aunt Mabel to break a leg on the way to Waterloo. Has Brendel an antipathy to giving a recital in the Festival Hall? I beg him, when he does it again, to move to the house next door, for it seems almost wicked to deprive no fewer than 2,000 people of so huge and uplifting an experience. And those adjectives are by no means too strong, for the truth about the series is that it was even better than the cycle he gave in 1977, of which I wrote that ...not only is nothing taken for granted, nothing perfunctory or unfelt; everything seems thought out from first principles, and everywhere there is a suggestion of surprise in the playing – so that's what Beethoven meant! – which has made me feel that player and audience were sharing a series of discoveries.

I would not unsay a word of that, but I feel that the emphasis has shifted. Now, the chief impression left by every one of the programmes takes the form of a conviction of absolute authenticity.

This is not just a negative matter, an absence, say, of excessive rubato, of dynamic markings exaggerated or ignored for effect, of grandiose or flamboyant gestures. Brendel's auth-enticity is of a different order, and it is significant, in this connection, that he is a fanatical pursuer of the Urtext: he will never take the word of Breitkopf and Härtel if he can find a photocopy of the manuscript, and I imagine that he wouldn't take the word of the photocopy if he could lay his hands on the manuscript itself.

That is just the beginning, for authenticity is much more than finding what notes the composer wished the preformer to play and then playing them. Yet as soon as we leave that safe, literal ground we are in trouble, for who can say how thoven wanted his music to sound? (I have heard a record of his keyboard music played on his own piano, but unfortunately it wasn't being played by him.) And even if Beethoven had given detailed instructions for the interpretation of his work, only a dolt would be so mechanical as to follow them and go on following them, for it is inconceivable that any composer, with the possible exception of Max Reger, would believe that a work once written is fixed for ever like a fly in amber, and that any subsequent deviation from the canonical reading is heresy; a true artist realizes, if only because he has experienced it in the case of works by others, that his art is not static

but dynamic, and that it changes, despite the fact that it was created long before, as time goes by and

In other words, there is an infinity of authenticities in the Beethoven sonatas (yet another definition of art, it occurs to me); but that did not stop Brendel's versions, over these seven enchanted evenings, sounding as though they had sprung fully armed from the composer's noble brow, Take the Hammerklavier, a test in which no pianist can hope to bluff his way to success. It is almost as far beyond any previous piano sonatas, including Beethoven's own (it is his 29th) as the last quartets are ahead of anything earlier in the same genre. The colossal last movement is one of the wildest pieces of music in history, though we smile now at the scandal caused by the first movement of the Eroica, we have still hardly caught up with the monster fugue ("fugue with some licences") that ends the work. It must sound as though it is about to fly apart like the atom being split, though it must not sound like the musical equivalent of action painting. Well, with Brendel, every bar of it sounds perfectly logical, controlled, mar-shalled like a squad of infantry, and yet more dangerously explosive and exciting than a cavalry charge.

Take another test, possibly even harder, Op 27 no. 2. Playing the Moonlight is the pianist's equivalent of an actor speaking "To be or not to be"; the entire audience can sing along, so how can it be made to sound unworn without introducing eccentricity? In Brendel's case, by lavishing on every phrase such intensity of feeling that we are simply unable to hear the familiarity; it is as though a man struck dumb 20 years before has suddenly recovered the power of speech.

So it has been throughout; he even played Far Elise as an encore one night, with not a soul in the hall but had beard it murdered a thousand times by the neighbours' daughter, and in consequence most wholeheartedly wished it dead and buried, along with the daughter. I tell you Brendel played it with as much fresh beauty and tenderness as absolute authenticity

he brought to the Appassionata itself.
All the way through we have been transfixed not by the performer's art but by the composer's - the last test, and the most searching of all. Brendel vanishes behind the music; it is almost true to say that if you shut your eyes you miss nothing. What you gain is a journey, in Brendel's company, through Beethoven's genius, a journey of 32 milestones on each of which is carved passion, understanding, joy, hope, confidence, beauty, power, together with suffering and darkness and, at the last, a serenity which is not of this world, but which Beethoven has been trusted to bring down to us from his own Sinai of despair defeated.

The series finished on Wednesday, it ended, fittingly, with Beethoven's last sonata, the Op. 111. As that final, infinite chord died away, there was a long, rapt silence before the applause began; we all felt, as Brendel does, that after the Op. 111 there is nothing more to say (it was the only one of the recitals at which he played no encore). But when the applause did begin it was heartfelt and prolonged; Beethoven's ultimate triumph had communicated itself to us with such force and urgency because of the way in which Alfred Brendel played the works. I was one of some 1,100 people in the hall; I hope none of the others will think me presumptuous if I say that I am speaking for us all when I say

Swapping bouquets of barbed wire across the border

It is not a pleasant experience 1971 transit agreement on access to crossing the East German border. In my case the customs official was apparently friendly. But his banter became increasingly pointed: where had I spent the day in East Berlin and with whom? Had I been to the GDR before, known anyone there already? Names please, and addresses. And then I was beckoned into a small room and asked to turn out my pockets and my wallet. What were these papers, was this money accounted for?

The tone was correct but intimidating. I felt menaced by unspoken threats, by suggestions of undefined guit, and when everything was eventually given back and I was politely wished goodbye, I found I was trembling.

For West Germans the experience is often far worse. Travellers to West Berlin, people visiting relatives, are tolerated but not welcome in East Germany, and the brusque, often rough manner of the border officials, and the lengthy formalities are intended to make this clear. Many people find the atmosphere oppress-ive, and those who indeed transgress the complex regulations, deliberately or unintentionally, experience a sudden rush of fear.

For two West Germans this has recently had fatal consequences, and their heart attacks have had farreaching effects. The chain reaction, started by the outcry here over Herr Rudolf Burket's mysterious head injuries, led to loudly trumpeted charges of murder by Herr Franz Josef Strauss and his conservative admirers, which in turn provoked a furious counter-reaction from East Berlin, culminating in the abrupt cancellation of a planned visit by Herr Erich Honecker, the East German leader.

In the space of two weeks the delicate web of relationships linking the two countries, 10 years of patient cultivation of grudging trust, have been torn to pieces. The hardliners on both sides of the border have won a sudden and imerspected victory.

Chancellor Kohl. must be furious.

He believes strongly in keeping the dialogue alive, in the continuity of the "special relationship" that was beginning to grow up across the East-West divide and survived even the change of government in Bonn. But events moved too quickly for him. His old rival, Herr Strauss, still smarting from his worsting in the coalition negotiations, saw his chance and ran with it. The festering antagonism between the Christian Social Union and the Free Democrats broke out into the open, and the Honecker visit became the focal point of a public slanging match. Dr Kohl's avuncular calls on everyone to calm down were drowned in the

In fact the outlook is not quite so gloomy. A return by Bonn to the old policies of all or nothing, to the demands of German unity and free elections in the East, is out of the question. There may be a diplomatic sulk, some sharp and timely words to East Berlin about easing restrictions on human contact if it still wants the vast financial aid it is now getting But the Brandt Treaty with the GDR remains the framework for relations. And most people have realized that the cherished aim of improving the lot of fellow Germans
"over there" can be achieved only in an atmosphere in which the East does not again feel threatened -morally, politically, ideologically and economically - by its powerful western neighbour.

On the eastern side, dependence on the West to maintain living standards, especially at a time of economic crisis in all Eastern Europe, is now so great that East Berlin cannot afford to break off contacts and contracts. It has also come to see itself in an all-German context: not politically, of course, but culturally and spiritually. Ordinary people feel part of the western world by proxy. They take part vicariously in the debates and social currents now sweeping West Germany. And the leaders have concluded that it is not possible to consolidate the East German state always a principal aim - on a basis of opposition to West Germany.

East Germany has long given high priority to stability between the two states. It has been drawn willy-nilly into the process of "coming together", which has perforce had to replace the unrealizable dream of German unity. More than just a right to die

Two years ago, when the sensational Exit trial was pending and the Voluntary Euthanasia Society was in disarray, the police raided the society's office, seized copies of its booklet, A Guide to Self-Deliverance, and arrested - briefly, and with embarrassment - its then chairman, Lord Beaumont

The society was told that it would be prosecuted if it continued to distribute the booklet: it continued unintimidated — though, as always, only by mail order to bona fide members sged at least 25.

It is an indication of the haze of uncertainty surrounding the whole concept of "aiding and abetting suicide" that in fact no prosecution followed; an injunction was threatened but that was not implemented either, and finally the Attorney General settled for a simple declaration of the matter in the civil courts. This was heard last week, but turned out to be a further instalment in the saga of unknowing: the judge, Mr Justice Woolf, gave a judgment which was seemingly favourable to the VES cause, but pronounced himself unable to grant a declaration without further discussion. The question remains unans-wered, but will not cease to be asked: where exactly does the concerned third party stand, legally, in relation to what one of last week's counsel called "the sovereign unalienable and absolute right to die"?

Much of last week's inconclusive argument hinged on whether or not the dissemination of general knowledge and advice about methods of suicide constitutes the aiding and abetting of an individual, which the law has traditionally punished. Less attention was paid to what some observers have felt to be a more fundamental question - namely, whether one can logically be said criminally to abet an act which is not in itself a crime.

The concept of suicide as a felony was a hangover from Ecclesiastical law. Its repeal in 1961 was uncontroversial; no one any longer wished to punish the failed suicide, any more than they wished to bury the successful in unconsecrated sround with a stake through the heart. The consequences of removing the crime from the statute books but retaining the surrounding legislation do not seem then to have been envisaged. It is significant of the ad hoc nature of British law that, in Scotland, where suicide was not a felony anyway, the abetting section did not and does not exist, and therefore it has been possible to publish the booklet north of the border without fear of trouble. Life and death are issues notoriously unamenable to parochial legislation. Effectively, countries cannot make their own rules without reference to neighbouring countries: an arbitrary prohibition (anti-abortion law, for example) simply sends the determined on short trips Britain is not the only country where the whole topic of self-deter-mination at life's end is up for debate. In Roman Catholic France a book called Suicide: Mode d'Emploi is on open sale to anyone, and contains a how-to-do-it chapter largely plagiarized from the VES guide. More than 100,000 copies have been sold. Despite some frantic allegations by individuals, there is no evidence that the suicide rate has risen sharply in consequence, and no sign of a state attempt at intervention. Similar literature is on sale in Holland, West Germany, Switzer-land and in some states in America. From America in March came the report of a presidential commission on medical ethics which had been sitting for two years; its main conclusions leaned heavily in the proving difficult to implement. What we are seeing is, I would submit, not a debate about suicide at all. That takes place in the privacy of the heart. Last week's case was about the freedom of knowledge. Experience in other fields has shown that you cannot, with the best intentions in the world, prevent people from gaining access to common sense information if that is what they

Behind the VES pressure lies a passionate desire not for death but for independence, for honesty, for not being pushed about to gratify other people's moral sensibilities. Whatever you may think of some of the possible long-term results of this demand, it is hard to deny that the impulse behind it is a healthy one.

THE ISSUE'S THE THING

The debate over unilateral nuclear disarmament is one of pretend that this fact settles the the critical issues of our time. No argument. They are idealistic or inevitably aroused, and when anxious, or both. They have a feelings run high political right to know who leads the argument cannot always be conducted at the most elevated level. It is hardly surprising, therefore, that the exchanges are now focusing upon personalities as well as upon policies.

To some extent this is not only inevitable but legitimate. It is relevant to point out that a high proportion of those who are prominent in the leadership of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament are people of the far left in one form or another. The political background of the leaders must be a factor in the way that the campaign is conducted, and there is no reason why this knowledge should be denied either to those who support CND or to the public at large.

movement, but that knowledge is unlikely to change the judgment of most of them. They will believe that the issue transcends the personalities, and essentially they are right.

Unilateral nuclear disarmament would be damaging to this country not because it is advocated by the far left, but because the policy is based upon a profound misconception of western security and the nature of international affairs. A course of action that would reduce the pressure on the Soviet Union to negotiate on disarmament, that: would put the Atlantic Alliance in jeopardy, that would make it doubtful whether the American nuclear umbrella was still held

But it would be wrong to over the United Kingdom, that would leave Britain without the nuclear blackmail, would not which is supported by a great make this country a more confident or safer place.

> It is on the grounds of national security, peace - a desire for which is not the monopoly of the unilateralists - and the best means of securing disarmament all round that the issue deserves to be settled. It is ultimately on these grounds that the issue will be settled, simply because the question is of such importance that public opinion will ultimately be convinced only by what it believes to be the merits of the case. That cries of "smear" and counter-smear" should now rend the air is evidence not so. much of triviality as of the magnitude of the battle. But the more the debate can be concentrated on the substance of the policy, the better it will be for the country. It will also be the better tactics for each side to play the ball and not the man.

THE WRONG COURTS

Two separate court decisions this week have spotlighted a disturbing legal trend. It is the growing use of the civil courts to. enforce the criminal law. In the first decision, involving a trio of cases under the Shops Act 1950, the Court of Appeal held that local authorities were entitled to bring civil proceedings for an injunction to restrain shopkeepers from unlawful Sunday trading. In the second, a High Court judge refused an application by the Attorney General. for a declaration that the distribution of the Voluntary Euthanasia Society's booklet, A Guide to Self-Deliverance, was an offence under the Suicide Act 1961. Significantly, it was stated in the proceedings that the Attorney General had originally ently proliferated. In last week's envisaged seeking an injunction Sunday trading case, a firm of against the defendants as well as solicitors told the Court of a declaration, but that he had later changed his mind because for an injunction was commonly he expected that the Society and indeed daily invoked by would in fact observe the terms local authorities in such cases as the utmost caution, has now apparently become the common currency of the courts.

Using the civil courts to enforce the criminal law is an extremely dangerous exercise. It puts the defendant in double jeopardy. If an injunction is issued against him, and he breaks the injunction by committing the offence, he is liable not only to be prosecuted in the criminal courts but also to be subjected by the civil courts to unlimited penalties for contempt of court. Further, although in the criminal proceedings he has the advantage of the high standard of proof required of every prosecution, he is deprived of this benefit in the contempt proceedings. And there is a risk that a finding by the judge in the civil case that the defendant is in contempt may prejudice his chances of acquittal in the proceedings. The case against the Voluntary Euthanasia Society highlights a further drawback to this method of proceeding. In a serious case (not the kind of case which would normally fall within a local authority's responsibilities), where the crime injunction is tryable on indictment, the defendant to the contempt proceedings is deprived of his constitutional right to be tried by a jury. That is plainly unacceptable, and was recognized as such by Mr Justice Woolf in the High Court case.

The division bell had sounded. and all members within direct or electric earshot were hastening loyally to the Chamber to cast their votes within the seven minutes that the bell allows, Mr Edward Heath had sprung into his car at the signal and was cruising towards Parliament with minutes to spare (this was last Wednesday, by the way). But only a hundred yards from the Palace of Westminster he was brought to a halt it was the police, clearing a way for the Queen Mother as she rode to a reception at Fishmongers' Hall. Mr Heath had to wait four minutes before his car was allowed to proceed. By then the doors of the voting lobbies had been closed. It is a familiar problem: there has long been intermittent controversy in Westminster about the constitutionality of the Bridge Street traffic lights, which contribute to a greater average smoothness of access by MPs, but only at the cost in individual cases of facilitating the approach of some Members by barring it to others, with potentially dangerous discriminatory effect. On Wednesday the obstruc-tion was especially grave for it was committed not by just anybody but by (or at least in the interests of) royalty. It is scarcely too much to say that the Civil War was fought, or at least brought to a head, over this very issue. Royalty is not to detain, waylay or beguile MPs on their way to settle the destinies of the nation-with the dignity of a Privy Councillor. Some MPs did exactly that on Wednesday. But at exactly this point of the argument, Erskine May wavers and becomes uncertain. Undoubtedly Mr Heath had a right to advance unobstructed, but it is by no means clear that this right extended to his car. The most relevant analogy is perhaps the right formerly possessed by servants of MPs to all their masters' privileges - to run up debts, thumb their noses at subpoenas, and no doubt to approach the House. But this transferred right was ex-tinguished, or more properly passed over in silence, by the Parliamentary Privilege Act of 1770. It seems that car and driver have no claim to passage except insofar as they facilitate the MP's own approach - which in this case they seem rather to have obstructed. But without delving into the further implications for privilege that this opens up, it is enough to let the case stand as a reminder to selection committees, where vacancies for the next election still exist, of the advantages of a candidate who can put in a bit of leg-work on occasion, and is not

Under English law you can call yourself what you like, and it may please Mr Jenkins to have a leading part in a political charace, but no one should be misled into thinking that such hubris-provoking dispo- an incumbent Prime Minister by a sitions have any constitutional British Sovereign in well over 100

Mr Steel further appears to be of the opinion that if a Prime Minister appointed in such circumstances fails to command a majority in the House of Commons he would have no right to a dissolution. That view was taken in theory by Queen Victoria, but in practice she never refused a dissolution.

Edward VII granted Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman an immediate dissolution when he formed his government in 1905 and in 1909 granted Asquith the same right when the Budget was rejected by the Lords. There is no example of a dissolution having been refused to an incumbent Prime Minister by a

The moral to draw from all this is that just as England, as Mr Distacti said, "does not love coalitions", nor does she care for hung parliaments. An indecisive election could well lead on to a further immediate election which the voters would certainly not welcome. This is a good argument for resisting the temptation to vote for a third party. Needs of blind phone users

From the Director General of the Royal National Institute for the Blind

Sir, The Royal National Institute for the Blind is concerned that the special needs of blind telephone users, including blind office workers, should not be overlooked in the Telecommunications Bill when it is discussed in Committee in the House of Lords on May 5.

The Bill provides fairly wideranging powers to meet the needs of disabled telephone subscribers, but over 1,200 blind people earn their living as telephonists, using adapted switchboards with pulsing pins or synthetic speech instead of flashing lights and digital displays. Many more blind office workers, such as secretaries, have to use multi-line telephones.

Privatisation of the telecommunications industry is likely to mean that more manufacturers, both British and foreign, will be market-ing new equipment in the UK. We believe that it is essential to help so many blind workers to keep their jobs that the Telecommun Bill should be amended to include in particular in the definition of a consumer disabled people who use telecommunications services or equipment at work.

We do not feel that the Bill, as it stands at present, gives the Secretary of State and the proposed Director General of the Office of Telecommunications sufficient powers to enforce a requirement that all telephone apparatus sold in the United Kingdom should be readily adaptable to the needs of blind employees.

There are many blind telephonists in other European countries and the Commonwealth. If the need for adaptability is taken into account at the design stage, there should be little or no additional cost. Indeed, British manufacturers should find such a requirement a sales aid rather than a hindrance.

The Royal National Institute for the Blind is concerned, too, that, to meet the needs of blind people and other disabled groups, telephone operator services, including the directory inquiry service, should continue to be freely available.

I hope that readers in a position to do so will support the amendments to the Bill designed to meet these points when they come up in the House of Lords. Yours faithfully,

E. J. VENN, Director General, Royal National Institute for the

Special Commissioners

From Mr C. W. Koenigsberger Sir, The Finance Bill contains the welcome reform whereby the Special appointed by the Lord Chancellor instead of by the Treasury. This change underlines their independence and the judicial nature of their functions. It is therefore the more remarkable that the procedural rules for which the Bill also provides are to be made by the Board of Inland Revenue, a body which is a party in virtually every dispute determined by this tribunal.

Notwithstanding that the rules may be vetted by the Council on Tribunals before being submitted to Parliament, it is surely a retrograde step to make it appear as if the Board of Inland Revenue exercises supervisory functions over the

Where credit's due

From Mr Mike Faber Sir, A main pleasure of following cricket in the newspapers is the comprehensive picture of play given by the scorecard. But there is one type of event, of increasing influ-ence, in the description of which the scorecard is defective. That is the run out.

No matter how brilliant the feat, no matter how decisive the incident, the perpetrator of it remains anonymous. It is as if the early designer of the scorecard assumed that run outs only happened through the idiocy of the batsmen, and the less said about that the better. Could you not persuade your

Cricket Correspondent to take the lead in remedying this defect? The convention, "RO Parker: Gould", or "RO Parker" if he did it unassisted, would convey over a sesson lots more information at the cost of little extra space. And while he is about it, he should right the wrong hitherto inflicted on the substitute fielder. 'Ct sub" is unworthy. Your Football Correspondent does not treat Mr Fairclough, of Liverpool, that way. "Ct "Smith" would do it.

CND and Prague peace conference

From Mr E. P. Thompson

Sir, The silly season is on us. It is said that employees of the Ministry of Defence have assisted in the ransacking of the private histories of citizens on the national council of CND in order to issue to the public the shattering news that this one is a "dedicated Bennite" and these others resigned from the Communist Party as recently as 28 years ago. I did not know that this is what we paid public servants to do.

Last week I learned that Mr Heseltine had been on the transatlantic phone to the Secretary for Defence of the most powerful nation on earth and had warned him that "the Government" would be embarrassed if he were to fulfil a debating engagement in the Oxford Union at the end of May. As a result Mr Caspar Weinberger agreed, with some reluctance, to withdraw.

This was, in an old-fashioned view, an extraordinary and improper intervention by a minister of government in the affairs of a private society - and also, since the debate was to be televised, in the affairs of the media. But we have to remember that Mr Heseltine is an enthusiast for "modernisation". And now we have your own odd editorial (April 21) on the decision of CND's national council to send observers to the forthcoming conference in Prague. You take this as evidence of communist "entryism" in CND, whose positions you go on to describe as being "identical with those of the extremist left in Britain."

Of course, if you (and Mr Heseltine) redefine the "extremist left" in such a way as to take in half the Liberal Party, all the Labour Party, ecologists, most church and chapelgoers, a great part of the medical and academic professions, and much more, then you must be right. And it follows that our modernisers will be finding a great deal of fresh work for the phonetappers and security services.

was one of the large minority on CND's national council who opposed CND's attendance at Prague. But I can assure Mr Ray Whitney (April 25) that the council's proceedings are in no way "mysteri-ous". There was a fair and open debate. And the council took the view, by a small majority, that a boycott would be counter-productive, and that whatever the formal proceedings might be like, there would be opportunities to

Parliamentary terms

From Mr Philip Wright Sir, May I be allowed, please, to express a different view from that expounded in your leading article, "Timing it right" (April 16)?
You say, "one of the defects of the British political system since the war has been the frequency of changes of direction in government policy". In my experience what concerns most of us is not the frequency but the nature and extent of such changes. How can we plan with confidence or enthusiasm for our futures when the economic and social structures within which we operate are liable to drastic change at the hands of successive governments? The answer to this problem lies not in lengthening the parliamentary term. Indeed the discontent now manifested in strikes and demon-strations could become intolerable if the electoral safety valve were kept shut even longer.

Should we not be asking why these wasteful changes occur? Why should small, often gradual shifts in popular opinion be allowed to Teachers' pay

From Mr Peter Targett Sir, I write to give wholehearted support to your first leader's timely appeal (April 12) for teachers' salary scales to be more directly linked to the quality of their teaching performance.

Sir. What matters about British participation in the World Peace Council meeting in Prague is surely not whether members of the British nuclear disarmament movement go there but what they do there.

When representatives of the radical wing of the British move-ment went to the World Peace Council meeting in Moscow in July, 1962, they didn't just let themselves be manipulated by the media of the East or be insulted by the media of the West; they circulated leaflets among the local people and organ-ized a demonstration in Red Square which was authoritatively described as "the most direct challenge to official Soviet policies and ideas to have been presented to the Soviet man in the street since freedom of speech died under Stalin" (Victor Zorza in The Guardian, July 12,

If representatives of the radical wing of the British movement go to Prague and do something similar 21 years later - at the same time marking the fifteenth anniversary of the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia - they could challege the militarist policies of both East and West more effectively than the official spokesman, their supporters in the media, or the orthodox peace campaigners of either side.

We believe in direct communication as well as direct action in both directions, and in going where we can and doing what we can, regardless of sneers and smears. NICOLAS WALTER, 88 Islington High Street, N1.

Patriots of the air

From the Chairman of The Save England Crusade

Sir, May I congratulate you for your 'Pigeon English" photograph (April 25), portraying a pigeon, with my wife and myself, at our St George's Day rally. This pigeon is actually the Officer Commanding the thousandstrong Trafalgar Square contingent of the Pigeon English Corps, who are some of the most dedicated devotees of St George, as one would expect from their close association with Admiral Lord Nelson. Soon after your photograph was taken I made a stirring call for St George's Day to be made a public holiday in England, with national celebrations in which, for one day at least, our political, racist and other differences could be forgotten and we could all celebrate together as one community, as in days of old of "Merrie England". This oration was of course directed in the main to the of course directed in the main to the large crowd of humans who, incidentally, are not shown in your photograph, being not behind me, but well in front behind the crash trigger off major changes in governbarriers, and it brought forth loud cheers and prolonged clapping in Support.

Not to be outdone, thereupon, in a mass flight of acclamation, the Pigeon English, every one of the huge contingent taking part, swooped low over the crowd and gave the most magnificent fly-past that I have ever been privileged to see in some 30 meetings I have held in this great arena. In England today not only is there a new St George spirit about among the humans but among the Pigeon English, too.

Yours faithfully, FRANK HANSFORD-MILLER, Chairman, The Save England Crusade, 76 Lock Chase, Blackheath, SE3.

Flight of fancy

From Dr J. B. Barbour Sir, Captain Hamilton suggests (April 23) that a duck freezing into a pond belongs to the realm of Ambridge fantasy. But in the winter before last a similar fate all but overtook our Muscovies on the brook.

After several days of intense cold, wearily paddling around in the last remaining stretch of clear water, I found them one morning in a pathetic state, with lumps of ice as big as cricket balls attached to their wings and tails. The rescue operation was cold and hazardous.

Having always thought their name indicated a Muscovite origin, I was surprised to find they could barely cope with a mere -22°C. However, the dictionary explains that the name derives from musk and they are in fact native from Mexico to southern Brazil.

The geese coped with no trouble with the night when Oxfordshire was the coldest place in Europe, but we had to keep the ducks shut up. Yours etc, JULIAN B.BARBOUR. College Farm, South Newington, Banbury, Oxfordshire.

Record price for Studio vase

A large stoneware vase, standing more than two ft high, and made around 1960 by Hans Coper secured the highest auction price on record for Studio pottery at £10,450 (estimate £4,000 to £6,000) at Sotheby's yesterday. Coper made few pieces as large as this, and the result is an object of striking sculptural quality.

The sale demonstrated generally the Coper cult in healthy form, with new adherents joining the small but devoted band of his moneyed admirers. The more easily available smaller pots, around 10 inches high, were being sold by Coper himself for around £50 to £70 10 years ago.

Christianity in public life

"The corridors of parliaments and international conferences often seem like spiritual deserts." So write Charles Piguet and Michel Sentis, co-authors of a recently published book, The World at the Turning.

One is a Swiss Protestant and the other a French Catholic. Their aim is to provide evidence "that the world always alters for the better when individuals change for the better", to quote Cardinal Koenig in his foreword.

A chapter on "Public People" contains this statement: "There are missions to the young, to seamen, to immigrants, even to prostitutes, but no one seems to have much idea of how to develop a mission to our public men and women".

A number of reasons can account for that. Often those who have grown to have strong religious beliefs withdraw from public life in search of release from pressures which they feel prevent them from being true to themselves. Again, some, who remain in office, are discouraged by opposition and the fear of unpopularity.

How right St Paul was to advocate prayers for those in authority. Their needs are as great as ever today. A classic example of an attempt to apply Christian principles to the administration not only of a country but also Emperor Constantine. Robert Browning has it that "a man's reach should exceed his In the United States a grasp". Constantine's reach was sincerely Christian President

Gibbon stated that "he seated Christianity on the throne of the Roman world". He has certainly left a legacy, which has lingered for centuries, of people becoming church members by virtue of their citizenship rather than their personal beliefs. For that reason it is not surprising that many have held that his official recognition of the church had a spiritually debilitating effect. They main tain that in the place of the eternal Rock of Ages on which Christ founded his church, Constantine substituted socia

Professor Gwatkin took a different view: "He must ever rank among the greatest of emperors; and as an actual benefactor of mankind, he stands alone among them . . . Above all, it was Constantine who first essayed the problem of putting a Christian spirit into the statecraft of the world".

The examples of history do not necessarily provide us with models for imitation. It is one thing to agree that statesmanship requires a double portion of the Christian spirit, but another to know how best to introduce it.

As we face the effects of the moral and spiritual erosion that are threatening the fabric of our culture we are not in a position an empire is that provided by to pass glib judgments on any serious attempts to counteract

Unlike President Carter, he was acclaimed originally as a power-ful and popular leader by his military supporters. It was only later that he came to appreciate the value of a universal church as a useful uniting force.

The conflict of loyalties of which he was conscious was expressed in his last hours. He was unwilling to discard the purple robe of imperial power for the white baptismal garment of a Christian neophyte until he lay on his deathbed and his work was done.

No one can deny the influence of emperors and presidents. But has not the ordinary person today a much larger role than he often realizes in providing a pattern of statesmanship on which his future so largely depends?

There is a growing awareness that the problems that are defying solution are basically more moral than political, more spiritual than economic.

SIR RALPH TURNER

Professor W. S. Allen writes: Your obituary of Sir Ralph Turner (April 26) omitted to mention the crowning achievement of his scholarly career, the monumental Comparative Dic-tionary of the Indo-Aryan Languages, published in 1966. It was the fruit of over 50 years of study, but only after his liberation from the demands of administration was he able to devote his full energies to its compilation. It was followed in 1969, and its value immensely increased, by a volume of indexes to the individual languages compiled by his wife. There followed a Phonetic Analysis of the entire corpus of material, again based on the work of his wife but introducing to Indian lexico-graphy the use of computer analysis. In 1957 the School of Oriental and African Studies published a special volume of its Bulletin in honour of Sir Ralph, with contributions from 57 scholars, it also listed over 70 of his publications, dating back to 1912. It is some indication of the span of his scholarship that in a recent publication I had occasion to refer to two articles by Sir Ralph, one ("A note on the word accent in Greek music") dating from 1915, and the other (on Indo-Aryan phonology) examine the state of both Oriental and African studies. In 1946 the report of this commission led by Lord Scarbrough encouraged the Univer-sity Grants Commission to provide earmarked grants in order to improve the country's reserve of experts in Asian and African cultures. Under Sir Ralph's administration as Director of the School of Oriental and African Studies, and at his exhortation, some 100 new teachers were trained for this purpose within 10 years.

Kindliness, wisdom, and understanding underlay his work as Director, teacher, and colleague, and an entire generation of Indian scholars, led by Chatterji, Katre, and Saksena, were inspired by the contri-bution first of Sir George Grierson and then of Sir Ralph Turner to the history of Indo-Aryan language. A further large selection of his many articles was published in 1975 under the heading of Collected Papers 1912-1973, and masterly articles flowed even until his 93rd year.

Sue Bradbury's content has been nothing to write home about. Now comes Robin Blake's new weekly series of six dramatized features. Tales of a version had at least the virtue of City. Certainly, if the first programme (The Num of Kil-burn, April 24) is any guide, no one could object if Capital wants to hold this enterprise up sounding like spoken English, while the awful situation Lorca depicts of a newly widowed matriarch implacably deter-mined to impose her will on the emotional ferment of her five in front of its assessors as an disagreeable daughters is prob-ably powerful enough to survive a transition into any language. example both of good intentions and good performance. forced by the music to do otherwise. One might imagine the piece done with all the perversity of the German expressionist cinema, and though that might suit much of music better than these stately casino scenes, it would miss the very Prokofiev-like twist of human beings stiffening into caricatures. At first it seems we are in for a Classic Serial interpretation of the novel. But then at the end of the first act, Alexey's idiotic insult to a German baroness is hideously overplayed by the music and strikingly underlined by the production: I have never before heard anyone sing while performing cartwheels, though of course, Graham Clark's unembarrassed involvement in the central role goes beyond that. This is, indeed, an interpretation to set beside his other recent gambler, Tchaikovsky's Hermann. He uses his razor sharp lyric tenor to bring out Alexey's amused irony as effectively as his wild-eyed craziness at the roulette table, and it is right that he should touch softness only when, with fluting inward-head voice, he loses himself in manic fantasy. The development in Alexey

from ironist to madman is facilitated by music which is so often at once satirically sharpedged and utterly bizarre: not the least pleasure of the evening is that of hearing an unfamiliar and wholly-remarkable score leap out of the pit under the excited but also purposeful direction of the young Romanian conductor, Christian Badea, he reveals a work that becomes as the leaders and the conductor of the property of the prope becomes as kaleidoscopic and becomes as kalendoscopic and bizarre as The Love of Three Oranges, while retaining the grounding in reality that makes it a much more unsettling

John Tomlinson as the General, a much more relaxed, accepting gambler than Alexey at the tables of fate, also takes full advantage of the move from realism into absurdity. His apeplexy and dimness seem first the usual attributes of the stage officer, but in his big scene of breakdown in the third act they blossom exotically into the tics of a cartoon figure.

None of the female roles offers quite the same opportunities. Sally Burgess makes Pauline, Alexey's beloved, enig-matic and hysterical all through, with a tendency to flare that is apt. Jean Rigby's demi-mon-daine Blanche gains power from being the one character to keep control as the opera begins to break up around her. Ann Howard produces a nice portrait of grandmama in her irrepres-sibly naughty nineties.

After a War and Peace successfully revived at this house and an Oranges at Glyndebourne, the ENO Gambler suggests Prokofiev may be the next twentieth century operatic rediscovery after Jana-cek. Now we need a Flaming roaring-boy performance in a leather suit, with a little wit and much coarseness, but certainly no second thoughts until it is too late to make sense of the interpretation. Even in her opening scene, tormenting her hated pretty sister at a rope's end, Sinead Cusack shows the pain behind the shrewishness, play that represents Petruchio-as "almost a model of intelli-gence and humanity" who, initially mercenary, breaks down Katherina's neurosis for her face as tight as a mask. Petruchio's subsequent humili-ations of her are not softened a whit; indeed, she suffers worse because, flinching in advance of each taunt or game, she knows him well enough to foresee it. Then, in the scene where he ns a painfully conventional along with it as a joke and the rest is plain sailing. The idea of Petruchio as humane humorist has been tried, but it does not fit here. The production just uses a bit of it to plaster the cracks between the initial brute and the sensitive lover at the end. With Jonathan Pryce's performance fresh in the memory, I wonder they dared. But that reach-medown attitude is typical, with its stupendous and wasteful appar-atus of funny costumes (Bob Crowley's elegance as a designer-never deserts him, even when clothing a grotesquely over-played Trapio in a gold suit and calls the sun the moon and orange frilly blonse), bands addresses the aged Vincentio as wandering on and off dago "gentle mistress", she plays voices anything to-raise laughs

(which they do) behind which shallowness can take cover.

Several jokes are Bogdanov hangovers, like Lucentio and Tranio getting caught with their pants down when exchanging costumes (can we have done with that one, finally?). New-comers include the pool downstage into which Petruchio and Katherina sling each other after quite a nicely played scene. A director who sticks a swimming pool in the planked floor of an Elizabethan chamber must be desperate indeed. And Christmas carols, following whichever critic has said this was a winter comedy, alternate with summer hot enough for sunbathing.

The third issue arose out of the terms of rule 16 of the Coroners Rules 1953, as amended, which provided, inter alia, that a person who satisfied a coroner that he was a properly interested person should be entitled to examine any witness at the inquest, either in person or by counsel or solicitor. In deciding what was meant by an interested person it was necessary to bear in mind the nature of the inquiry. Normally one had to be connected in some way either with the deceased or the circumstances leading to his death.

The Hackney Black People's Association was a voluntary nonparty political organization whose objects were to look at the economic and social conditions of the black community in Hackney, including police/black community relations. The association had no special relationship with the deceased and was in no way involved with his death and, on the material so far out before the coroner, was not an interested person. If it were an interested person then every other individual or body concerned with race, relations would also be As the coroner was prepared to hear further submissions it was unnecessary to decide whether the sufficient opportunity to indicate why they should be regarded as In considering any additional submissions the coroner should bear in mind that while rule 16 indicated the circumstances in which a person had the right to xhaustive of his discretion and that he had a residual discretion to allow questioning if he considered for good reason that it was appropriate

No final decision had been reached in respect of the associ-ation's application to be treated as an interested person and it was inappropriate to grant a declaration. His Lordship would have thought that it would be possible to find a suitable alternative venue within the coroner's district which met the police objections and would allow more of the public to attend, say about 100 people including the coroner, jury and lawyers.

Before Sir John Donaldson, Master of the Rolls, Lord Justice Dillon and Sir Denys Buckley [Judgment delivered April 28] Trafficking, for the purposes of the Trade Marks Act 1938, meant disposing of a mark, or the reputation in the name, as of itself a marketable commodity, in circum stances where there was no trade connexion between the proprietor of the mark and the goods or business in relation to which the mark was to be used. The risk of deception was not an integral part of the definition. The Court of Appeal dismissed an appeal by the American Greetings. Corporation against a decision of Mr Justice Whitford who dismissed their appeal against refusal by the Assistant Registrar of Trade Marks

Assistant Registrar of 1 rade Marks (Mr D. G. A. Myall), acting for the Registrar, of 12 applications by the appellants to register the name "Holly Hobbie" as a trade mark. Section 28 of the Act provides:

"(6) The Registrar shall refuse an application under... this section if it appears to him that the grant thereof would tend to facilitate thereof would tend to incurate trafficking in a trade mark."

Mr Robin Jacob, QC, and Mr Michael Silverleaf for the appellants: Mr Gerald Paterson for the LORD JUSTICE DILLON, in a reserved judgment, said that the appeal raised an issue of trade mark law which was of considerable general importance and novel. lants were an American company based in Cleveland, Ohio, who had for many years carried on business as designers and producers of greetings cards.

In 1967 one of their designers produced a drawing of a little girl in a patchwork pinafore and billowy bonnet to whom they gave the name of "Holly Hobbie".

The drawing and the name had proved remarkably popular with the American public. They had been used extensively by the appellants on or in relation to their greetings cards and other goods in a relatively small range which the appellants

It was not in dispute that the appellants were properly entitled to be registered as the proprietors of the mark "Holly Hobbie" in repect of those goods, but the 12 applications with which the appeal was concerned were not in respect of

The activity known as character merchandising had for many years been common in America and known, if less common, in this

A person who had a popular fictional character to exploit, for instance, a fictional character from a film or television series or book or drawing, did so by granting licences to use the character, its name, and relevant copyright material, usually on a royalty basis, to licensees who wished to promote their own goods by using the fictional character in ociation with those goods. The appellants were approached by manufacturers in the fashion trade who wanted to use "Holly Hobbie" on their products, and so the appellants entered on the activity of character merchandising. They had been so successful at it that, on their own promotional literature, their licensees now produced over 400 products, from -shirts and lamps to towels and olls and other toys and including cakes, biscuits and other foods. The appellants desired to have the protection of trade mark registration of the name "Holly Hobbie", as a name only without the drawing in respect of the various classes of goods which the appellants' licensees wanted to

The sense of that from the appellants' point of view was byious; there was no copyright in the mere name of a character and there were decisions at any rate at first instance, to the effect that the inventor of a fictional character could not bring a passing off action against a person who chose to use the name of that character to promote his business in some field of commercial activity in

Judge warns reporters who abuse drafts

Where copies of a judge's draft were made available to reporters it were made available to reporters it was wrong that any part of the judgment should be reported until the judge had completed delivering the judgment.

MR JUSTICE WOOLF, sitting in MR JUSTICE WOOLF, sitting in the Queen's Bench Division on April 29, said that a complaint had been made to Lord Lane, Lord Chief Justice, that a reporter who had been supplied with a copy of his Lordship's judgment on April 28, (The Times April 29) caused a report of the case to be given to the BBC before delivery of the judgment had been completed, with consequence that what purported to be his Lords conclusion was relayed on Cecfax

Attorney General v Able and before the judgment was concluded.

Others

When conice of a judgment was not concerned with whether the allegation was true but he wished to say, with the authority of the Lord Chief Justice, that if a judge, to assist a law reporter or other reporter, made copies of his judgment available, it was clearly wrong that any part of it should be reported until after the judge completed giving judgment. Over recent years 2 more relaxed practice had developed with regard to making copies available to reporters, but, clearly, if that assistance was abused as alleged in the present case, that practice would not be able to continue and courts would have to adopt a much more restricted attitude. Solicitors: The defendants' solicitors in the above case were Calvert-Smith & Sutcliffe, Richmond.

activity to support a par

12 applications which came before the Assistant Registrar and the question for the court was whether what the appellants wanted was permissible under trade mark law. The Assistant Registrar and the judge held that it was not. Each of the 12 applications was supported by a registered user agreement with the relevant licenses registered user. It was common ground, and here was the nub of the case, that if the registered user agreements fell foul of section 28, and in particular of subsection (6), and could not be accepted by the Registrar, the rejection of the applications for registration of the mark "Holly Hobbie" had to follow.

The registered user agreements were in substantially common form. Each was terminable on relatively short notice and each contained, in form at least, comprehensive provisions for the exercise by the appellants of quality control over the goods of the licensees marketed under the mark "Hoffy Hobbie".

In particular, the licensee under In particular, the necesser assume took to use the mark only so long as the goods were manufactured in accordance with standards, specifications and instructions submitted estions and instructions sub or approved by the appellants; the appellants reserved the right to inspect the goods on which the trade mark was to be used and the methods of manufacturing such goods, and the appellants had the right to approve all packaging and advertising of such goods and the licensee undertook to amend any packaging or advertisements which were not approved.

If the registered user agreements fell foul of subsection (6) as tending to facilitate trafficking in a trade mark, then the appeal had to be dismissed, because the subsection

Trafficking in a trade mark had from the outset been one of the cardinal sins of trade mark law. But there was no statutory definition of trafficking, and one might suspect, that, as with usury in the Middle Ages, although it was known to be a deadly sin, it had become less and less clear, as economic circum-stances had developed, what the sm actually comprehended.

The position could be summed 1 Section 28(6) showed that trafficking in a trade mark was still a sin and the registration of a user agreement was prohibited if would tend to facilitate trafficking. 2 Trafficking in that sense meant, in Lord Loreburn's words in Bowden Wire Ltd v Bowden Brake Co Ltd ((1914) 31 RPC 383, 392), disposing of the mark or the reputation in the name, as of itself a marketable commodity. 3 Before 1938, that was shown if the mark was disposed of, or a licence was granted, independently of the goodwill of the relevant usiness of the registered proprietor.

4 Since the 1938 Act came into force, that last criterion had to be relaxed in that section 22 permitted assignments of a mark apart from trafficking remained prohibited, the criterion now was that there had to be a trade connexion between the proprietor of the mark and the goods of the licensee on which the mark was to be used.

Mr Jacob submitted that there was a trade comersion in the present case because of the quality control provisions on the licences granted by the appellants. His Lordship did not doubt the enuineness of the quality control provisions in the appellants' licence agreements, and he assumed that the appellants would endeavour to ce those provisio

But the reason why they were required was not to preserve the appellants' business in greetings cards, but to protect the character whom the appellants were marketing, that is, to protect the mark as of itself a marketable commodity. If goods marketed under the name of "Holly Hobbie" became known as inferior, or in the case of foods, unfit for buman consumption or tainted in some way, producers of high quality goods would become unwilling to pay for licences to associate their goods with the name. The position could be illustrated by taking in vain the name of very well-known manufacturers, who no doubt in fact had no thought of such

If Rolls-Royce decided to market the well-known Rolls-Royce badge of quality by granting licences for money to use the mark to a wide of, for example, lawn mowers, motor boats, wrist watches, bicycles, transistors and other equipment, that would plainly, in his Lordship's judgment, be trafficking in the mark, and might well lead to the confusion of the public which Lord

It would not be any the less trafficking and impermissible under section 28(6) if each licence agreement included quality control provisions to ensure that the licensed products were not shouldy goods of their kind.

It might well be that character marketing did not involve any deception of the public. People who saw the figure of Mickey Mouse on a T-shirt or a box of biscuits would not assume that Walt Disney Productions had gone into the clothing and food trades. Equally people who saw "Holly Hobbie" on a toy would not be led to buy it because the appellants sold good greetings cards; the expertise was

But the risk of deception was not an integral part of the definition of trafficking, it was merely the reason why trafficking, which his Lordship would define as disposing of the mark, or the reputation in the name, as of itself a marketable commodity in circumstances where there was no trade connexion between the proprietor of the mark and the goods or business in relation to which the mark would be used, was

His Lordship would dismiss the appeal.

Raymond Chandler described it as the greatest waste of human intelligence outside an advertising agency. Many of Britain's growing number of chess. players would cheerfully endorse that assessment of their favourite pasume. For some, though, the growth of cness as a length. A weekend tournament sport and the rewards brought usually comprises six such by increased sponsorship can make it seem an attractive investment of mental energy. Of the three or four million in this country who enjoy an oc-casional game of chess, some 40,000 take it ser ously enough to sacrifice freque it evenings to club and league matches. Ten thousand of these form the hard core of dedicated these addicts who may be seen participating on the circuit of weekend same represents about four hours of intense concentration. In many respects the experience may be likened to that of sitting an examination of the same examinations crammed into less than 48 hours. A typical schedule begins with one game on the Friday evening, followed by three rounds on the Saturday in an orgy of almost continuous play lasting from breakfast time until midnight. Then up again on Sunday morning for another two bleary-eyed battles.

There can hardly be a more exhausting way to spend a weekend, yet so popular are played among the last eight survivors until only one remains undefeated. He becomes the crucial world championship qualifying match earlier this month was decided by spin of 1 roulette wheel. After the scheduled 10 chess games scores between Vassily Smyslev of the Soviet Unionand West Germany's Robert Hübner. The match went into four games of extra time, but still no result. With a suitable sense of the dramatic, the players and officials adjourned to the casino. Hübner's fortunes were staked on the black numbers, Suryslov's on red. The ball landed in the zero hole.

The result was a tribute to Smyslov's longevity as much as his lack. He had held the World Championship for a year a quarter of a century ago. Now 62, he is still a great player, but nobody really expects him to last the course without exhaustion taking its toll. His pext ment will be Zohan Ribli, a appament will be Zahran Ribli, a Hangarian grandmaster 30 years his junior.

They tried again. Trois, impair, rouge. And Hübner went out.

A match for the World Chess Championship is held every three years. That is the time taken to play the cumbersome series of eliminating contests designed to determine the man best qualified to challenge for the title. Every chess-playing nomince in the early stages of the contest so, in theory at any rate, everyone has a chance to become world champing.

Only the most highly placed in each eliminating event qual-ifies to proceed to the next stage. The last battles are a series of 'candidates matches'

ments each year at different locations throughout the country. The atmosphere is strained but friendly, despite the intense level of competition and often cramped playing conditions. Chessboards are lined up on such events that there are now more than 200 weekend tourns-

trestle tables, under which contestants jostle for leg room. The only sounds are the ticking of chess clocks, reminding players that they have only a limited time in which to execute their moves, and the susurrations of shuffling cheesmen as whispered analysis diagnoses the causes of defeat in already finished games. Occasionally the tension produces a harsber plea for silence from one whose eme is still in progress.

The rigorous schedule is a skill and may explain why chess has become very much a young man's game. Anyone over the age of 30 is liable to be described as a veteran in the chess press. Beyond that, it is difficult to characterize the typical weekend chess warrior. They are predominantly middie-class, university educated and male. Although the growing popularity of chess seems to be quickly eroding the class and education barriers, the sexual stereotype is more firmly entrenched.

Nobody is quite sure why the best female chessplayers have never reached the standards of their male counterparts. Socio-logical, physiological and psychological explanations have all been advanced, but none less convincing than the Frendish theory: a player's strongest ally is his queen (mother-figure) which helps in his aim of slaying the enemy king (patri-cide); such an Oedipal urge is a male preserve; ergo, 'women can't play chess.

I don't believe it and neither do our top women players, who have recently taken the first step towards equality by showing an increasing tendency to reject participation in women-only events in favour of unisex competition. The old effemi-nate mantle of the British Ladies' Chess Association was thrown off last year with a change of name; the new "macho" image is represented by the British Women's Chess Association. Chessmen beware.

Even before the roulette For the time being, however, wheel had reduced the number the leading male players take home most of the cash prizes in of candidates to four, many weekend tournaments offered eliminated from the current cycle. Even if not truly a sport, chess can certainly claim to be one of the most international of all competitive activities. Canada's Yukon province is larger than Germany yet has a population about that of Bury Edmunds; its Northwest Territories are larger than Europe with a population no more than that of a largish English village, so you can see what I mean. The Alaska Highway is no longer classed as a "wilderness road" but there are plenty that are. One is the Dempster Highway of 725 kilometres which meanders its empty way across the silent terrain from Yukon's Dawson to remote Inuvik in the Northwest Territories. En route there is only one filling station and the road surface is made of volcanic chips that will lacerate a tyre at speeds above 30 miles an hour. The Trail of '98" leads northeast and by driving the first portion of the Klondike Loop road, then continuing Taylor Highway, you will pass a resurrected gold rush camp with new blood coursing through veins that have been dead for decades. At the end of the road, no more than a stony track through endless pine forest, lies Eagle, another gold rush settle-ment on the banks of the Yukon River. Here again you can smell the lure of gold but around Jack Wade junction the roadside is littered with old dredgers and the bones of mining machinery. EATING OUT Accolades as experts gather

The pursuit of excellence leads a party of culinary cognoscenti to deepest Battersea for a meal that marks a milestone in gastronomic history

CHEZ NICO 129 Queenstown Road, Losdon, SW8 (720 6960); Tues-Fri 12.30-2pm, Tues-Sat 7.30-10.45pm

The British Academy of Gastro-nomes took their first meal together recently. Founded at the instigation, and under the presidency, of Egon Ronay, the Academy's objective is to advance standards of food and beverages "at all levels of consumption". I am one of some 50 founder members assorted food and wine con-noisseurs, authors, journalists, businessmen, academics and

The form is that members if the Academy meet for hunch or dinner every four to six weeks at selected restaurants. The fare and wines are arranged by one member, and appraised, in the presence of the chef and staff, by another.

The first place to receive the kudos of a visit was Chez Nico, an ironic, though thoroughly appropriate, choice since Nico Ladenis is a man of determined and outspoken views who spends much of his time at daggers drawn with the restantant guide editors.

The eastronomic host was

The gastronomic host was Charles Florman, the European publisher of Fortune magazine, a man whose job involves him in an enviable amount of gastronomic summitry. He chose Nico's, he said, because he had found it a useful and reliable place to come to. The menu was largely his choice.

He had prevailed on Nico to reinstate a Sauternes gelée with his duck liver parfait, which Nico had abandoned because customers invariably left it on the plate. We should not blame the customers, Florman sug-gested, because in most restaurants gelée was not worth even trying. He had also suggested qualls as the main course: Nico had preferred the served with two puries, of garlic and tomato with basil.

Wines had been chosen by Alian Hall. I noted that I was out of fashion (ahead? behind?) taking framboise in the cham-pagne. With the duck liver (nine parts ordinary to one specially fatted) and following mousseline de sole in a cream sance. textured and brightened with minutest dice of vegetable we had a Trimbach Museat 1971, Reserve Personelle, a rarity in Britain (and everywhere by now) but from the restaurant's hist. With the youngest of lambs, we had the youngest of Beaujo-lais - a 1982 Brouilly, Chateau Thivin, which also ac-companied grilled goat cheese with a salad of mache dressed in hazelnut oil.

A kirsch parfait with coulls

de framboises brought us full circle to the thuscat flavour, an ean de vie de Frontignan. The critical commentary was

Apple, London bureau chief of the New York Times and a collaborator on Egon Ronay's recent TWA guide to Europe's business city restaurants. We were not to be shy about applying cosmopolitan standards to British cooking, he told us, and marked Nico's meal at 161/2 out of 20 - good from a man who can rate a leading London hotel's breakfast at three out of 20 when feeling

The duck liver parfait was perfect, but the gelée under-flavoured ginger or sherry were suggested as additives. The mousseline, beautifully pre-sented and finely flavoured, he found too similar in texture to what went before. The English lamb was the finest he had ever eaten, but the purées were really sauces, and perhaps there were too many flavours fighting on

Apple prefers cheese straight: I, who like salads composed around it, thought the chèvre too fresh and too superficially grilled for its role here. The parfait of kirsch, a dish Ronay particularly admires, had had its coulis de framboises reinstated after coulis de cassis, tried by the Academy organizers at a test meal, proved over-powering. The wines Apple thought particularly

Nico, to the relief of those who know him by reputation only, took the criticisms in good part, and agreed with many of them. My own conviction was that the £31 I paid for the meal was money well spent. Next we go to Inigo Jones, where the critic will be Sir John Plumb, Master of Christ's College, Cambridge. My ticket application is in I find it fun cating with people who can score their food down to the decimal point.

Luggage is not an easy subject the three dimensions. At the found but has no shoulder to enthuse about. Unfortunate- moment hand higgage is rarely ly, we all need it, although we weighed but the limit is 5 kg Soft nylon zippered grips and holdalls with hand and shoulder probably use it only once or wice a year. It takes up a lot of storage space and ideally should straps are widely available and ideal for stuffing under the seat. The de luxe models with be a once-in-a-lifetime investment. Investment is not an idle external pockets are best of all choice of word, for in any shop these days decent luggage is rarely below £50 apiece for and these cost around £10: cheaper versions should have man-made fabrics and nearly their zips, seams and strength of four times that for leather. The smartest range I have come across is sold at the colourful City Bag Store, a company which over the past four years has done a lot to promote informal luggage. Called Le Sportsac and made in the US, it comes in a variety of sizes, shapes and colours in a very durable parachute and nylon fabric. It is claimed to be rip-proof, has self-locking zips, is waterproof and machine washable and folds up easily into a sponge-bag size pouch. Most models have loads of extra external pockets and shoulder straps. They range from £12.50 to £49.50 and a good-sized bag 21 in x 13 in x 10 in, costs £37; a wardrobe bag or suiter is between £33.50 and ler and author of The Tropical £37 and a roomy back-pack, Traveller (Pan. £2.25). points 121/2 in x 151/2 in x 5 in £23.50. Many traditional luggage turers now make both soft and hard suitcases which meet the hand luggage dimensions and, depending on how long your trip is and how light you can travel, these bags are a perfect means to a speedy exit: from the airport.

Karrimor, a company, was started in the 1930s to make cycle bags and turned its hand to rucksacks for which it is now a market leader. It has now brought out a range of soft luggage in very hardwearing, hightweight, non-scuff DuPont Cordura and their specially treated, easy-to-clean Silvaguard. Called "adventure luggage" with the brand name Karentura, it is aimed particularly at people undertaking outdoor holidays or activities and comes in two-tone ice grey and pale blue with black trim and zips. All have a unique feature that enables the bag to be drawn in to fit the contents and can take a Karoo, a series of zippered internal pockets for shoes, washbag, and so on, that clip inside the bags. Their flight bag, the Kordiale, which fits under the seat and has a shoulder strap, costs £45.50; their large "designer" rucksack £93. A colour brochure shows the entire range and is available from Karrimor stockists, many luggage shops and in London at the YHA shop in Covent Garden. Their rucksacks come in all sizes, degrees of sophisti-cation and colours. Rigid, or semi-rigid, with internal or external frames, they cost from £10 to £100.

Papworth Industries, founded in 1921, and now governsponsored, have an leather luggage. They are hotly tipped to win a 1983 Design Council Award for the new Yuki range. Designed by haute case and comes in three sizes, 26 inches, at £14.99, 28 in £15.99 and 30 in £16.99. It is available at this price in the 900 or so Woodworth stores Council Award for the new Yuki range. Designed by haute couture designer Yuki, the range is tastefully plain and hand-made in fine quality very soft black or Sienna (bright) red stocks last.

The 23 designs, which range from a purse to a large suicase/suit carrier 22 in wide with loads of pockets and a shoulder strap, are designed never to leave their owner while travelling. Mind you at £238 for the latter I'm you at £238 for the latter I'm magazine pouch, lock and a sure no one would want to part secondary security flap with its with it. Without the suit carrier. the same case costs £189 and both have two lock systems. A suiter which takes two suits costs £158 and an overnight

Another British company Mulberry, well known for its leather belts, bags and ready to wear has also diversified into luggage. This fishion-oriented Two of the company injects a bit of style into the world of luggage and its most popular lines (all of which fit under a plane seat) include a carpet bag 20 in x 15 in with a 5 in gusset, top zipper, two handles, and reinforced studded bottom in royal blue or cream canvas with natural leather trim which costs £56.50. The same bag in rubberized cotton in khaki or china blue costs £49.50, optional shoulder strap £4. A mail order list is available

A pricier bargain from the British company Leestar is only available for three days, June 28 to 30 inclusive, at the Lyceum Ballroom Cash and Carry Sale. It is a range of classic style supple hide cases all with a Gucci-type vertical green and white canvas webbing stripe. The bags are soft, lined, have a own lock. They normally retail at more than £100 a piece but in the sale will sell at almost half price; 24 in x 18 in x 7 in, £50, 36 in x 24 in x 7 in, £55, and 48 in x 24 in x 7 in £59.

Hard cuses

Two of the most tasteful foreign fashion ranges can be seen at Finnigans in Knights-bridge and Wilmslow, Cheshire. The Swiss Traveller company has a very smart range of bags made in strong pvc with a suede-look finish and leatherlook trim and straps. Available in burgundy, black or navy the fabric has a beige "g" all over it, but this looks much nicer than it sounds and all bags are soft and fully co-ordinated down to handbags and holdalls. Sun-cases from 25in to 29in cost £72 to £82; spacious carryall £46.50. Geolet is a range of very tasteful though their range is reduced Danish luggage of exceptional this year their current promo-value and comes in beige this year their current promo-value and comes in beige tional line is hard to beat canvas with brown leather trim and wheels. Suitcases in a choice of burgundy, ten or from a 31 in case at £69 to 26 in grey/blue, it is a soft zippered at £55 but they also do a superb, tall roomy shopping bag with four wheels which fold up. It costs £34.75.

Despite specializing in tra-ditional, preferably British, luggage like the entire soft, hard and new lightweight Antier range, superb Tanner Krolle craftsman-made leather luggage (about £200), the lightweight very durable US Lark and exclusive lines, Mr Dunbobin who has managed Finnigans' Knightsbridge shop for 45 years feels the trend is towards soft luggage and positively glows over the Yuki range.

Hard cases are certainly the most secure in terms of locks but as James Cunningham the assistant luggage buyer at the large Selfridges luggage department points out, any luggage lock can be broken by a determined thief John Hatt warns travellers against putting a name and address label on the suitease. House burglaries committed while the res are away on holiday have been traced back to baggage handlers. Some say it is tempting fate to buy status luggage but if you must, Harrods have a very reasonable range with their distinctive "H" printed bokfly on the outside. Made in nylon, all their luggage is soft, available in black, burgundy, or navy and ranges from £19 for a carryall to £59 for a 28 in case on wheels with a shoulder strap. Harrods also keep the stylish Pierre Cardin range which is surprisingly reasonable. Available in burgundy or black, a 65cm case in vinyi with leather-look trim costs £96. The Burberry range' starts at £52.50 for a carryall; zippered suitcase with straps £120 and flight bag with lots of pockets and shoulder strap £75.

The ultimate in status luggage has to be Gucci. Their cheapest is a 50cm "woven" case with a nylon thread running through with the distinctive "gg" diag-onal, or tan or gold diagonal design strip, £95. Most expensurp, 193. Most expensive is their made-to-measure Rolls-Royce luggage, would you believe a mere £1,500 for a 75cm suitcase?

will flower in the water or at the edge of the pool. Calla palustris the Bog Arum has white flowers and blends ideally with the Marsh Marigold Caltha palustris with its yellow flowers. Lysichitum americanum and Lysichitum camschatense, with vellow and white flowers respectively and very large leaves, are interesting plants for the moist wet conditions, though do not grow in water itself, add further to the whole effect; they enable the interest to be maintained over a longer period. Astilbes suit the conditions as do the Day Lilies Hemerocallis, both provide colour as well as interesting foliage. Hostas is a big family and all will thrive. Primulas - in particular florindae and bulleyana - are good, but many of the primulas will do. Angels' Fishing Rods or Dierama pendula also likes moisture; the flowers are on long stalks with pendulous flowers, hence the common name. Another slightly different plant is Peltaphyllum peltatum; this flowers in April to be followed by large leaves in the summer.

Trees and shrubs to clothe the surrounds but not getting too close to the pool finish the planting when possible consider evergreens. Cornus alba and forms are good; the coloured stems are their best feature. Willows are noted for wet soils but in a small garden keep to dwarf varieties. Salix caprea, Goat Willow, reaches up to 15ft; S c pendula is even smaller, about 4ft high but spreading. Amelanchier and Spiraea are both good in Wet soils and they are not too tall Acer negundo is a small tree, as is Parrotia persica and they do add further interest. Whereheight and screening shelter is needed the Cupressus and Chamaecyparis evergreen, is

Brilliant bulbs

Buibs in the garden are at their best during late April and early May. Plans for next spring should be made now when builds are in flower. Tutips make an excell display and they last for at least three weeks in litewer. It is important to know the variety as they can vary so much in colour, height and flowering time. Spalding in Lincolnshire is sometimes called Little Holland.

This is because the area is so right for the commercial growing of bulbs. Although there are not as many bulbs grown as there are in Holland the spectacle should be May 7 is the day of the Spalding

Flower Parade; a parade of decorated floats travels through the streets of the town. This year some 18 floats are to be seen and for these floats many hundreds of thousands of tulip heads have been used. The parade starts from the sir Halley Stewart Field at 1.30pm and travels through four-end-a-half miles of Spalding's streets returning to its starting point some time later. This year's theme is:

"I at you and Group": foote will be "Let's go and Grow"; floats will be on display after the parade on May 7, 8, 9 and 10. Roeds are closed at about 1pm and will remain closed until the parade has passed. Tulips grown to be sold as builds are lined out in fields and they are only allowed to flower to ensure they are true to name and are not diseased. The bulbs are then deheaded, it is these tulip heads floats which appear in the parade.

Perhaps even more striking than the proliferation of chessplayers and tournaments has been the expansion of the chess book publishing industry in this country. A new chess title appears in England on average once every week. From the arcane. Queen's Pawn, Veresor System, via the encyclopsedic, Comprehensive Chess Endines, to the frankly silly, Soft Pawn, their titles promise an endless series of keys to unlock the mysteries of the game. Fiercely French Alsatians

The pretty picture postcard scenery of Alsace is everyone's idea of a traditional wine region, with its charming medieval villages, complete with gabled houses, steepled churches and neat tidy vineyards. Flowers are everywhere and every inch of this narrow ribbon of a wine region, tucked in between the Vosges mountains and the River Rhine in North-east France, exudes a contented, prosperous air.

But appearances can be deceptive and behind the Alsatian chocolate box exterior, lies a grim war-torn history whose switchback of nationalities from French to German to French and back again to German, before finally being declared French in 1918, created havoc with the Alsatian people who are at pains to point out that they are French even if their cobbled streets and nedieval houses often seem more Germanic in style.

The fragrant, flowery and fruity wines of Alsace sadily seem hitle-known and are rather under-estimated in this country. Curious perhaps when you consider we drink a lot more white wine than red, and that the popular taste is for young, fruity wines. Still, the first sip of any Alsace wine does come as a surprise; for instead of being slightly sweet, as their bouquet implies, these wines on the palate are bone dry and fairly austere to boot. But this dry, clean-cut direct character means that Alsace wines are silor-made for drinking with food, which is why most restaurant wine lists boast an Alsace section.

Apart from their taste, Alsace wines are also unique in that they have some of the easiest to understand wine labels in Europe - unlike their German neighbours on the other side of the Rhine. No need to bother with awkward place names and vineyard sites, the grape variety, printed in large letters on every bottle, will tell you almost all you need to know, and there is only one simple quality level -that of appellation contrôlée.

Of the six white grape varieties grown in Alsace, Sylvaner is often referred to as the workhorse grape and as I generally find most of the Alsace Sylvaner wines some-what dull and dreary, try instead the soft, fruity Pinot Blanc wines of Aisace, priced at roughly the same level.

One of the finest and fruitiest Pinot Blancs, that carried off a Gold Medal at the Macon Fair, is the 79 Clos de Strangenberg Pinot Blanc from Heim, available from La Vigneronne, 105 Old Brompton Road, London SW7, £4.35, and Windrush Wines, The Barracks, Cecily Hill, Cirencester, £3.28.

Excellent aperitifs, are the pungent Muscat d'Alsace wines; they are in the Aisace mould but unlike the rest of the world's muscats are bone dry. Muscat wines account for only a very small proportion of the total Alsace crop and are difficult to find, but Louis Gisselbrecht has a stylish pungent and austere '81 Muscat (Henry Townsend, Chaik Pit House, Coleshill, Amersham, £3.77). The rich, full-bodied Tokay wines, better known as Pinot Gris, are similarly an Alsace rarity that like the Muscat d'Alsace are much enhanced with a bit of bottle age and Alsatians enjoy knocking back precions wines such as Hugel's 76 Tokay d'Alsace, Vendange Tardive (late harvest) (Les Amis du Vin, 51 Chiltern Street, London W1, £15.80) with their highly prized special-ity, Foie Gras de Strasbourg. However, it is the lively Riesling and spicy Gewirztra-miner wines of Alsace that are this small region's finest wines. The most austere Alsace Gewürztraminers may not be to everyone's taste, but a soft, fruity and delicately spicy example that should go down well with most palates is Hugel's Gewürztraminer (Peter Dominic, £4.29; W.H. Cullen,

£4.70). An impressive Riesling, from one of the finest Alsace vineyards at Hunnawihr, is Trimbach's magnificent Clos St Hune '77 Riesling (La Vigneronne, £8.60) whose steelyslatey style seems to me, having tasted several old vintages of this wine, to improve every year. Expensive, but worth it!

A resolute hand for Brahms's best and worst

The box of big Brahms choral works conducted by Ginseppe Sinopoli fulfils my hopes of its being a mighty, off-centre contribution to the monumental complete recorded edition from Deutsche Grammophon. It is an odd collection of pieces. It includes what is quite the worst Brahms I have yet heard, the Triumphlied he wrote to celebrate the satisfactory con-clusion of the Franco-Prussian War and the foundation of the German Empire: it is as noisy and unthinking as anybody's

But of course there is also that symphonic masterpiece the German Requiem and its gathering of satellites, in addition to the curious dramatic

This lengthily indulged scene from Tasso is often quoted as Brahms's nearest approach to opera, but it is much more interestingly his nearest approach to Beethoven; and it is significant that his thoughts should have strayed in that direction when he was on unfamilar ground. René Kollo as the tenor soloist brings with him an unavoidable aura of Tristan, but the work's true is declared in the orchestral performance under Sinopoli, typically resolute and full bodied.

He sounds, though, a lot more interested in Brahms's thoughts on mortality and no doubt it was the vivid imagination he displays here that recommended him as the man to take charge of this enterprise. The choice of Prague forces is more curious, but the Prague Philharmonic Choir and the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra are well prepared to respond to the challenge of making Brahms's deathbed scenes as graphic and gripping as, say, Richard Straus's or Mahier's.

Take the opening of the Alto Rhapsody. The first hig orches-tral attack is a blow to the solar plexus, and thenceforth Sinopoli prefers physical descriptiveness to emotionalism or pure symphonic growth. There is a sense of faltering breath, un-steady movement and falling pulse, all conveyed nevertheless

A more contemporary foray, into the twentieth-century symphonic repertory, is provided by Klaus Tennstedt in his version of Mahler's fourth, and indeed by Simon Rattle in a recording of The Seven Deadly-Sins that titls the balance towards Kurt Weill's sweet and sour ambivalences, and away from Brecht's preaching.

This is without a shadow of a doubt the most beautiful Weill playing I have heard, with the most beautiful Weill singing from Elise Ross, Meanwhile Tennsted's Mahler cycle with the LPO presses on its way, gloriously and unaffectedly with a fourth symphony of bright imagery, easy character shifts and, again, exquisite singing from Lucia Popp.

Poor Pergolesi. The more we find out about his short life (he Concert Armonici 1-5 Academy of died at 26) the less he seems to have composed. Because of the fame of the Stahat mater and a few other genuine works, he became a prime target for unscrupulous publishers around the turn of the eighteenth century - like Haydn, his name was enough to guarantee sales no matter what the product.

It has long been suspected that the six well-known Concertini often played as his were written by someone else. The attribution rested on slender evidence, and Charles Cudworth, who delighted in musical spuriosities of all kinds, noticed that they were identical with an anonymous set published in the Hague in 1740.

Now the musicologist Albert Dunning has tracked down the real composer: a noble dilettante by the name of Unico Wilhelm van Wassenaer, who had a distinguished diplomatic career and spent some time at the glittering musical court of Dusseldorf. Dunning found a handwritten copy of the music with an autograph note by Wassenger which explains that they were written for concerts at the Hague, and that he allowed them to be published very reluctantly, on condition his

Arresting insights into Tchaikovsky's more serious songs

Tchaikovaky wrote more than 100 songs, most of which are still little known, though Söderström and Ashkenaz first volume last year started a valuable recording project on its way. Dietrich Fischer-Dieskan has surprised us by adding his voice to a catalogue which also includes Gedda, Souzzy and Ghiaurov. He wisely focuses on 17 sarer examples of Tchaikovsky's miniature melodramas and laments rather than on the lighter lyrical and folk songs, and performs them with an idiomatic richness of expression and a generally firm, if not always intuitive grasp of the significance; but the empathy of the two artists, epitomized by the tiny "Don't leave me" and their way with the mordant Slav harmonies of "Not a sound", brings fresh, often arresting insights.

Vladimir Ashkanazy shows a similar temperamental symsimiar temperamental sympathy in his performance of Tchaikovsky's "Dumka" in a micely varied Russian plano recital. It also includes a bracing reading of a Prelude and Fugue by Tchaikovsky's champion. Covering the period 1910 to 1920, the exhibits include examples of Lewis's vorticist paintings, war drawings and portraits, among them one of Ezra Pound.

PAULE VEZELAY Tate Gallery, Milibenk, London SW1 (821 1313), Until May 22, Mon-Set 10mm-6pm, Sun 2 6pm The Anglo-French painter has recently celebrated her minered birthday, and this retrospective is an overdue tribute. She was born in Bristol, spent many years in Paris, where she was involved in the the 1930s and returned to Britain in British artists to go over complete to abstraction, and her works indicate a militard traits and an kable individuality which should be better known. ALFRED WATERHOUSE Heinz Gallery, 21 Portman Square, London W1 (580 5533). Until May 28, Mon-Fri 11am-5pm,

But 10em-1pm The almost infinite riches of the Royal Institute of British Architects' collection of architectural drawings are called upon to light up the dar places of Alfred Waterhouse's career. In the Victorian era. Waterhouse was renowned as a master of practical planning. His invention in surface detail makes him peculiarly satisfying to see in design form, and since he was a with J. W.) he was well able to evoke graphically his most splendiferous visions. EDMILIND DULAC

London E2 (739 8368). Ulvill May 30, Tues-Set 10em-5pm, 200 2-5pm Arthur Rackhem's principal rival in the production of fancifully Riustrated gift books, especially for children, Dulac has had to walt until the year after his centenary for a major show of his work in all media. Of course, the illustrations to the Arabian Nights and other exotic tales still salzs most of the attention, but it is good to be reminded also of his spare and elegant designs for stamps and coinage (including both for Edward VIII), his painting and his varied work in the applied arts, all marked by his distinctive Anglo-French Jiw bna erufluc

THE HAGUE SCHOOL Royal Academy, Piccadilly, London W1 (734 9052). Until July 10, duty 10em-spm The Hague School of painters laid the foundations for some of the art. Inspired by seventeenthcentury Dutch canvases, their paintings between 1870 and 1900 were avidly collected in America and Britain. One hundred and thirty landscapes, marine scenes and interiors by Bloomers, Bosboom and other members of the school are on show, as well as several early paintings by Van Gogh and Mondrian, who were both influenced by them.

KINGS AND QUEENS The Queen's Gallery, Buckingham Place, London SW1. Until July 1934, Tues-Sat 11am-5pm
The latest selection from the Royal Collection is just what it says. Pictures, often portraits, of kings, queens and their families, or at east of people who were to become kings or queens. The main emphasis is not on the big names, despite the presence of a couple of famous Van Dycks, but on the less familiar images: Charles I and his family by Hendrik Gerritsz, Winterhalter's glimpse of Queen Victoria and her consort in Restoration fancy dress, Sargent's noble deathbed image of Edward emerging from Nicolas Roeg's new film, Eureka, they will hardly be caying "Eureka," Not because the film is terrible the meaning and quality of Rocg's work simply demands a thoughtful scratching of the head rather than an excitant shout of discovery. Walkabout (1973) is perhaps the exception: the culture clash between two well-bred children and an aborigine is crisply stated, easy to master. Elsewhere - in Performance (1968), Don't Look Now (1973), The Man Who Fell to Earth (1976) and Bad Timing (1980) - we tussle with an intricate visual mosaic, with plots that ricochef between various planes of reality. So it is with Eureka. NATIONAL OPERA BTUDIO If you want to see a preview of the work of some of Britain's burgeoning young opera singers as they begin their professional careers, the Bloomsbury Theatre, Gordon Street, London WC1, is host tonight to an evening of staged scenes from works ranging from Fidelio to Falstaff, presented by the students of the National Opera Studio at the end of their year's finishing-school course. Tickets available at the door for a 7.30pm start.

Drawing on experience and saving the day

For Placido Domingo, the performed in 1979, might be Spanish tenor, the role of Des suitable, when I talked about it Grieux in Puccini's Manon Lescaut is a favourite, and that is saying a lot for an international star with more than 80 roles in his repertoire. He makes his London debut in the part on Tuesday in a royal gala performance attended Queen Elizabeth the Queen Mother, with Kini Te Kanawa singing the title role for the first time and Giuseppe Sinopoli making his British opera debut as conductor. Manon Lescaut has not been performed at Covent Garden since 1969 and has had a controversial return. It was to have been the last new production of the season, and the brilliant cast were looking forward to working with Piero Faggioni, who had directed the Royal Opera's highly acclaimed production of La Fanciulla del West. But Faggioni had to withdraw through illness, and Disaster was averted, partly by Placido Domingo himself. He has been a distinguished Des Grieux in several productions in recent years, and his know-ledge was vital. "I suggested that the Hamburg production, which I sang when it was first to Sir John Tooley (general director of the Royal Opera House)", he recalled.

"It had to be a production with a set the right size."

So the opera will be per-formed at Covent Garden in the Hamburg State Opera production by Gotz Friedrich, with sets designed by Gunther Schneider-Siemssen and costumes by Aliute Meczies. The same team was responsible for Covent Garden's 1977 production of Der Freischütz. "I was disappointed not to work with Faggioni again but we were lucky to have the Hamburg production that I sang in' Domingo said. Manon Lescaut, based on Abbé Prévost's novel, was Puccini's third opera, completed in 1893 and his first to achieve international success. For the four performances which follow Tuesday's gala the new set was found to be performance, on May 9, 12, 17, and 19, 65 amphitheatre tickets will be on sale each morning at 10am. For those unlucky applicants who fail to get tickets, a video film is being made for transmission on BBC television in a few weeks' time.

Chess

Entertaining brevity in bygone Berlin

The Finnish international Bishop endings and Knight chess-master, Eero E. Book, endings. who is famous for having lost a beautiful game to Alekhine at Margate in 1938, has the engaging habit of sending me news of chess events in Finland from time to time. I should explain that we have been firm friends ever since I also lost a seautiful game to Alekhine at that same Margate tournament.

Now he has sent me details of a strong international tournament that took place at Helsinki from March 15-27. First prize went to the Swedish grand master Lars Karlsson who scored 81/2 points out of 11. Second with 8 points was our grandmaster, John Nunn, ahead of a number of other fine players, including four grandmasters, the Russian Yuri Balashov, the Hungarian Joseph Pinter and the Finns Rantanen and Westerinen.

Also, aware of my taste for chess history, he has sent me a historical sketch (his own words) of the celebrated Russian player and theoretician Carl Friedrich Jaenisch, who was in fact by birth a Finn (in

In an accompanying letter he says he has often wondered whether Jaenisch conversed with his friend Staunton in English or whether Staunton spoke French. I should explain that the Finn had come to London in 1851 too late to play in the celebrated first international tournament ever but had played, and lost, a match against Staunton.

From his writings it is clear Jaenisch had a mastery of French, but whether he also spoke English I do not know. But there is another point on which I myself seek enlightenment. Böök giyes Jaenisch's date of birth as April 23, 1813, whereas I, in my encyclopaedia, give it as August 11, 1813, as also do the Italians Chicco and Porreca, in their encyclopaedia. The chess historian, Dr Linder, gives it as April 11, 1813, which, give or take some days having regard to the Gregorian calendar, would seem to support Bóók's dates. Perhaps a reader may have something enlightening to say about all

Meanwhile let me heartily recommend a new book in the Perpamon Russian Chess series, entitled Comprehensive Chess Endings by Y. Averbakh and V. Chekhover, 213 pages, £12.50. This is Volume 1 and is on

معتقب والمنافق والمعتقب والمعتد والمعتقب والمعتقب والمعتقب والمعتقب والمعتقب والمعتقب والمعت

It has been well translated from the Russian by Kenneth Neat. In his preface to the English edition Averbakh explains that this is the first of a series of books on the endings and that there are still to come works on all other kinds of endings. This series is the second edition and during the course of revision two of his coauthors, Chekhover and Maizelis, have passed away.

I myself especially regret the death of Ilya Maizelis in 1979. He was a friend with very much the same enthusiasms and interests as my own. On my visits to Moscow I passed many a delightful afternoon and evening with him in his flat which was almost next door to the Moscow Conservatoire, so that, in order to get to his place from my hotel, I had to pass and give a friendly nod to the statue of Tchaikovsky. Ilya was a great authority on King and pawn endings so that, although knew more about other aspects of the game than he did, I sat at his feet where pawn endings were concerned.

That Jaenisch could play imaginative chess is shown by the following entertaining brev ity which he won against the well-known chess historian von der Lasa at Berlin in 1842. White C. F. Jaenisch. Black T. von der Lasa. King's Gambit Accepted, Cunningham vari-

Bridge

Gourmet fare too rich to digest at a sitting

For the last formight, bridge players have enjoyed the unprecedented luxury of watching two bridge programmes on

The format of the BBC's Grand Slam is well established. In Master Bridge, Channel 4 has treated the subject in an exciting and totally different manner. Where the BBC leans on the players' thoughts to guide the viewer, David Elstein, Channel 4's imaginative producer intersperses the lively commentary with snippets of the players' remarks.

· Master Bridge appears simulaneously with an elegant book of the same title, written by Nicola Gardener and published by Macmillan at £5.95.

I have no doubt the programme will enjoy a justified succès d'estime. But this is bridge in 1993 or maybe even 2003; in an understandable search for perfection, the hands prepared to test the experts are the caviar and foie gras of the game. To explain them with sufficient clarity to satisfy a mass audience would, I believe, be virtually impossible. Both visually and audibly it was easy to become distracted, as at a cocktail party with a group behind you enjoying a conver-sation more interesting than your own. The intoxicating brilliance of the rich bridge feast is too much to absorb in one short sitting.

A further problem, which could not reasonably be anticipated, was the unpredictability of the experts in every department of the game, as this hand, from the first programme, demonstrated. I have re-orientated it to make South the supposed declarer.

Declarer will win the club return and force out the A. West will get off play with a trump, which declarer wins. After drawing the remaining trump, declarer will cash the K, hoping for a 3-3 club break. When West discards on the second club, declarer has to form another plan.

The only hope is a squeezeagainst East in the minors. But remember East passed his partner's opening bid of one heart, so it is improbable that he has the OK. All is not lost, provided East has the OJ. Declarer plays the OQ. West covers with OK, and the O10 becomes a menace against East's OJ. A next example of a transfer squeeze. Back to grim reality. Zia led the VA and received an encouraging signal of the VI from Rose. Unhappily, Zia now conceived the notion of trying. for a club ruff for the setting trick, so he switched to the $7. Declarer tackled the spaces, Ziatook the AA, cashed the VK, and played a third round. So Rixi Markus made nine tricks without the aid of a squeeze. If pressed, she might have made 10 by following Nicola's suggested line. Room 2

The M&G Gold & General unit trust will invest for capital growth through a portfolio of gold mining shares based on South Africa, North America and Australia. An interest may also be taken from time to time in companies concerned with other precious metals.

Gold has been regarded throughout history as the ultimate measure of wealth and the ultimate hedge in times of uncertainty. The price of gold has been on an upward trend aimost continually during the present century, accelerating in the past 20 years. There are of course reactions from time to time, such as the setback after heavy buying had taken the gold price up to $850 in 1980; but these fluctuations seem to be only temporary interruptions in the long-

A well managed portfolio of gold mining shares tends on average to outperform the metal price, and it offers the additional advantage of a dividend yield. The estimated initial gross yield is 31.5%.

M&G have proved their expertise over recent years in the management of gold funds, largely through the medium of gold mining shares. The Group acts as adviser to a specialist overseas gold fund valued at approaching US$30 million.

It is seldom possible to judge the best time for investing in gold shares, due to their volatility, but we firmly believe that they should form a proportion of the partfolio of every serious investor.

Unit trusts are a long-term investment and not suitable for money that you may need at short notice. The price of units and the income from them may go down as annual premium (i.e. the amount you pay plus tax relief). Your first two years' premiums buy Capital units; subsequent premiums buy Accumulation units. The offered prices of both units include a 5% initial charge; Accumulation units carry an annual charge of currently 34% and Capital units an additional annual charge of 41/4% Although you can cash in your plan at any time after you have paid one year's premiums you are recommended not to do so for at least four years, to avoid a forfeit of tax rehef. Accumulation units are always encashed for their bid value; there is a deduction from Capital units on early encashment which reduces to nil after 10 years, e.g. you would receive 68% of their value after two years increasing by 4% for each subsequent year. Accumulation unit prices are reported daily in the Financial Times and Capital unit prices are available from M&G on request. You have no personal liability to tax on capital gains but higher-rate taxpayers are advised to continue payments for at least 10 years, for tax reasons Tax payable by the Company on capital gains is reflected in the price of units. Homebuyers angry as Miras clawback mauls pay-packets when they opened their pay packets this week to discover themselves worse off than expected. The telephone hasn't stopped ringing with readers complaining that the reduction in their mortgage repayments with the introduction of Miras Mortgage Interest Relief At Source) is considerably less than the cut in their take-home pay, and they are out of pocket.

Mr Neil Kinnock, Labour

MP, lost no time in accusing the Government of "diddling" homebuyers but it is the building societies who should be attacked.

The discrepancy between the cut in take-home pay and the reduction in mortgage repay-ments comes about because of three factors. First, mortgage interest relief granted last year was based on a 13.5 per cent mortgage rate when by the end of the year the rate was down to 10 per cent. The reduction in mortgage interest relief this year not only takes account of a lower mortgage rate, but also the extra tax relief granted last year which must be "clawed back". This would have happened regardless of the introduction of Miras and definitely not a "diddle". If anything, homebuyers were lucky to have been getting tax relief last year above that to which they were entitled. But the reason the discrepbetween take-home pay and the new net mortgage repayment is so large is because of the way the societies have chosen to implement Miras.

By offering borrowers only "constant net repayment option which evens out tax loan, borrowers receive less tax relief in the early years of the loan than under the old system. Of the main societies, only the Halifax has operated in the best interests of it customers.

giving borrowers the option to emain on the old system with high tax relief in the early years, declining as the loan is repaid. Worst off are those bank borrowers who have lost mortgage interest tax relief in their ax codings; are suffering the 'clawback" because of the over allowance last year, and are not being offered a lower mortgage repayment by the bank. Of the Homehuyers tax codings for 1983-84 have been dramatically reduced with the introduction of MIRAS.

The Revenue admits that it is not the fault of the banks which were asked to supply names of customers with "qualifying" gage interest relief). The banks duly supplied this information but the Revenue was not fast enough in processing the data to enable the banks to calculate the new lower repayments.

Those borrowers who find they are not getting their tax relief by either system should immediately get in touch with their tax office which will put matters right as quickly as possible by arranging for relief to be given in their PAYE codings or tax assessments. Loans which have not been brought into the new scheme will be brought in next year," says the Inland Revenue. Allowing for these cases where there has quite clearly

Discounting the not insubstantial number of cases where the Revenue has made a mistake, there are several factors which combine to take a large slice out of take home pay. homebuyers codings for the 1982/83 tax year were based on the March 1982 mortgage rate of 13.5 per cent. With a current mortgage rate of only 10 per cent, take-home pay would have gone down even if Miras had not been introduced. For example, a homebuyer with a new £20,000 loan would have been granted tax relief for 1982/83 on interest payments of £2,700 (£20,000 at 13.5 per cent). This year, the entitlement would be reduced to approximately £2,000 (just less than £20,000 at 10 per cent). This alone would account for £210 a year to a basic-rate taxpayer, even if Miras had not been introduced.

The second factor is that the extra tax relief granted last year must be clawed back during 1983/84. The homebuyer loses tax relief from his coding by an adjustment - in the case of a borrower with a £20,000 loan an adjustment of just less than £400 - to take account of the over allowance of tax relief in 1982/83.

Interest actually paid would have been £2,333 compared with the £2,700 allowed for in 1982/83's coding. This clawback will account for a further reduction in take-home pay of £110 a year for a basic rate taxpayer, in total his coding allowance will be reduced to the tune of £3,100, worth £930 a year to a basic rate taxpayer or £77,50 a month.

But repayments to the building society have not been cut by £77.50. In March the borrower with a £20,000 loan would have been paying £183.80 a month to the building society. From this month, his mortgage repaynents will have been reduced to £143.20 - a cut of only £40.60.

This is where the building societies become the villains. Had Miras never been thought of, our borrower with a £20,000 loan would have continued to make gross repayments of £183.80 a month on which tax reisef worth just under £50 a. month would have been al-lowed, making a net mortgage repayment of £133,80. So why are borrowers having to hand over £143.20 under Miras?

The answer is because of the have chosen to Miras. Of the main societies, only the Halifax has allowed borrowers to maintain the present system with higher tax relief in the early years of the loan. The other societies are claiming that they cannot cope with recalculating mortgage interest relief anew every year and have gone over to the "constant net repayment" system.

The only answer is to write to your building society and say you want to continue with the old repayment profile - not the constant net repayment scheme.

How to take problems out of the biggest investment in your life

In a couple of months, the 12 down pension schemes of have been fairly treated by the million members of Britain's former employers to claim a pension fund within the terms occupational pension schemes will be able to seek advice, locally and free, on what for many of us is the single biggest, and most misunderstood investment in our lives. Survey after survey demonstrates the most appalling apathy and ignorance of employees, many whom are paying up to 7 per cent of their salaries into occupational pension schemes often against their will and in the conviction that it is all an enormous fiddle.

Treading very cautiously comes senior civil servant, Miss Margaret Grainger, with Occu-pational Pensions Advisory Services (OPAS).

OPAS is trying for charitable status, and will probably be partially funded by the pensions industry. It is linking up with the Citizens Advice Bureau to provide a pensions information service at CAB's 850 branches, backed up by a panel of local, and central pensions experts.

Miss Grainger describes it as designed to give fairly unsophis-ticated advice and explain to pension fund members what their rights are. She wants to set up a tracing agency. One big fully expects to find that most problem, apparently is tracking of the referrals will prove to

When a fund is moved to a "bid" basis, as was Vanbrugh's, the notional costs of selling the properties in the fund and any capital gains tax liability is deducted from the unit price. This reflects the fact that more money is going out than coming in - theoretically, the invest-ments might be sold to meet the withdrawals. In practice, managers do not want to be forced into the position of selling investment properties, so with-drawals are met out of the cash liquidity margin which is between 10 and 20 per cent of

When Harvester officials sit down with the company's bankers this summer to renegotiate lending agreements covering $3.6bn, analysts say an accord to convert some debt to equity could result.

Harvester has reduced in size since 1979, before large problems set in. This is one reason why it needs to reduce its debt yet again. Its annual sales are less than half 1979's record $800,400m.

It faces losses which are estimated to total $325m to $450m in the year ending October 31, compared with a deficit of $100,640m in 1982. First Boston's Mr McGinty points to the bail out of Massey-Ferguson Limited, the battered Canadian farm equipment maker, as an example of what could happen. Massey's common shares outstanding has risen to 88 million from 18 million in June 1981, because of last March's refinancing, and other measures. That number assuming exercise of all warrants and conversion of preferred outstanding, McGinty (AP-Dow

Quiet gilts provoke cautious hopes

SHARE HIGHLIGHTS

Gilts closed the week enactive, and the best that can be hoped for next week is that prices will stay at the same

The impact on an already dull market of the new tap however well it is received as a pre-election hedge - must be to absorb funds that might have Even though the tap is partly paid, £400m must be produced next week.

Gilt prices barely changed yesterday, although the market welcomed the excellent trade figures as helping sentiment. On the week, short dates rose about five-eighths of a point, me-diums about a half a point and longs three-eighths. Index-lin-ked stocks were most heavily affected by the new index-linked tap, and were down a point and a half on the week.

Sterling is remaining a boost to sentiment in gilts. Confi-dence continues that interest tates will move down soon, but there is no talk of this being mminent

The level of increases in the money supply figures have led to forecasts that the authorities will want to step up their funding to take money out of the system, and so reduce inflationary expectations.

The developements in the US economy are also being helpful tap, and a third is still overhanging the market. Until there is a clearer political picture, or prospects of a cut in interest rates, gilts offer little prospects of excitement.

slow progress with the medium

Wall St

Wall Street's rally continued this week, although the heavy volume of trading caused pervousness that a correction was due. The government's announcement that next week's quarterly auction of Treasury $15,000m was well received, and prices have held firm.

Reinforcing confidence in Wall Street is the growing number of forecasts of further declines in interest rates. There had been fears that the weight of new government funding would again send domestic money market rates higher. This has been the recent pattern.

But after the announcement on Wednesday of the Treasury auction package the price of bonds continued to rise. So, provided that there is not a major deterioration in the US money supply, the economists believe, there could be a cut in the discount rate from the current level of 8.5 per cent.

The economists all say that the moderate pace of the notes and bonds will raise American economic recovery, and the recent evidence of a slowing of the money growth, all make it appropriate for a lower level of interest rates.

Comment

The markets continue to keep a close watch of the Fed funds rate as a barometer of pressure, and this has been coming down from the end of quarter phenomenon of more than 10 per cent to around 8.5 per cent. But a fail to 8 per cent or less is needed to excite hopes that a discount rate cut is imminent.

The week

it convincingly through the 700-level on the FT 30 index. While there were a number of good profits reported by leading companies. ICI exceeded brokers' estimates with a firstexceeded quarter £128m pretax, and stronger sterling renewed hopes of interest rate cuts, there were counter-balancing pre-election uncertainties and fears that the market may be nearing its top.

ICI announced an increase in the volume of sales, helped by the weakness of sterling and another good quarter expected. The market was also encouraged by the news of 1982's trading from Wimpey and Blue Circle yesterday. At Blue Circle. profits in the United Kingdom showed a rise of 25 per cent, but there was a fall of £14m in pretax profits to £90m because of sharp falls in South American currencies. Wimpey results were up by £3m to £45.7m last year. Tarmse produced another glowing set of figures with a 32 per cent rise to £68.7m pretax.

More growth is expected Earlier in the week Simon Engineering announced a small rise in 1982 pretax profits to £20.66m, maintaining its 10-year growth record. Ford UK suffered from the London followed Wall Street squeeze on margins last year, to a record high, but failed to and pretax profits fell from attract sufficient buying to take £220m to £194m last year.

weekend * appears to have replaced Easter as a major staging post in the football calendar, with most of the teams involved in promotion and relegation facing two matches in three days, which will go a long way to determining their eventual fate. It is a time when an unlucky bounce or a debatable decision can undo a season's endeavour, when nerve ends show and the ability to battle is often more important than talent.

Nowhere are these considerations more pertinent than among the clubs struggling to avoid relegation at the bottom of the first division. With only four games left and a gap of four points between Birmingham in twentieth place and Manchester City in nineteenth, it would be no real surprise if the bottom three this morning were to be the ones relegated. But all have a game in hand over Manchester City, whose meeting this afternoon with Nottingham Forest, their only one of the holiday, takes on greater significance as a result. A loss in that game coupled with wins for their rivals could see them in the bottom three itself, a remarkable decline from the moment in November when they briefly held second place. It a bad time to lose players, and City will almost certainly be without Reeves, who faces a fitness test this morning. Forest, who are still searching for points to claim a UEFA Cup berth, make an unforced change, Hodge returning after suspension to replace Proctor. A victory for Forest would provide extra incentive for both Birmingham and Brighton, who meet at St Andrews on Monday after trips today to teams still on the fringe of the struggle. Birmingham so to Sunderland seeking their third win in a row, a run which has lifted them off 22nd place after they had looked the most certain candidates for the big drop, with Stevenson and Ferguson fit to take their places in a 13-man squad. Sunderland, themselves on the crest of a slump without a win in seven games, make three changes, dropping Wor-thington and Cooke and losing Hindmarch to suspension. Rowell, Cummins and Whitfield replace them.

Brighton go to Notts County, who have won only once in their past nine games, leaving their team manager Howard Wilkinson admitting: "We are absolutely desperate for points." Probably not as desper-ate as the Cup finalists, although with a visit to Birmingham on Monday fol-lowed by a visit from Manchester City next week, Brighton, more than most, have their fate in their own hands. Robinson and Case face fitness tests, however. If Case fails to make it, the former club captain Neil McNab will play.

Should McNab take his place, it will provide yet another striking example of the career fluctuations footballers face. After some outspoken remarks at a supposedly "no-holds barred" team meeting, McNab fell into disfavour, became the club's forgotten man during the Cup run, and was loaned to Leeds and recently Portsmouth. problems grew, and now Jimmy Melia says: "McNab's past differences with the club are forgotten. His attitude has been first class since he came back and I am certain he can do a good job for us."

Another player with special reasons for doing a good job today is Swansea's captain, Robbie James, who celebrates ten years of League football against Ipswich this afternoon. entiment demands that he should mark the occasion by scoring his 100th League goal but with his club in bottom position, three points would be an even more acceptable present. Swansea's situation is an unenviable one, but they at least have two home matches over the weekend, with Aston Villa visiting on Monday.

Cunningham plays his first full game since joining the club on loan, Grime moving back to replace the injured Albiston, and he, like McNab, must be having most unexpected dreams of a Cup Final appearance.

The proposal for a live match in a volucid scholals has now been amended, and will go some way to meeting the clubs' somewhat contradictory demands. As the clubs wanted, the number of matches to be acreemed at the wenkand will be reduced from 10 in four, which would include a 'part live alammat'. It means that assue of the bigger first division clubs would be playing on Saturday nights and Sanday afternoous to fit in with the vision chubs. Aithough no details were forthecoming, it is expected that the smooth tail would be shown live.

The TV companies have also

The TV companies have also offered some concessions on advertising althour whether they have gone far enough to meet the clubs in what is, for many, the most important point in the negotiations remains to be seen. The TV companies have maintained their meritages. The TV companies have maintained their resistance to slogans on the shirts, but smaller logos would apparently be acceptable. Final details were not agreed at yesterday's meeting, and they will contact Graham Kelly, the Football League secretary, with their "final words on shirt advertising" early next week.

BBC's negotiator, Jonathan Martin said: "We have to try to face the reality of sport as it is now. We have been trying to find a way of reflecting the sponsors in football. But I don't think, as sportsmen, we would like to see other sportsmen walking about as advertising billboards. We have also to guard against the exploitation of our screens."

in income if they could wear it on television, this could well still prove 2 crucial objection to the offer. Mr Kelly is writing to the club chairmen with the proposals, so they will have time to digest them before Thursday, and in the meantime he was guarded. "I can't say whether we are aptimistic or maintie," he said.

Brian Winstone, an Orient director and a member of the League's Television Committee, admitted that the proposals were not the proposals and the proposals. We have done what we can in our way to compromise." Mr Martin and John Brundey, Mt Martin and John Brundey, ITV's head of Sport, were also hopeful that an agreement would be reached. "We shall be very disappointed if the proposals are not considered very seriously, and accepted," said Martin. As the TV companies are well aware the withdrawal of the Telejecter offer after much adverse criticism and doubts as to its practicality, gives them the whip-hand. The reduction in the number of games to be shown will please all but the hard-core of chairmen, who feel that all TV football should be alendoned, and the change from the earlier proposal for complete live matches will meet the objections of the hig clubs, who fearest that all their most attractive games would be on TV, with a consequent loss of gate income.

Most important of all however.

Most important of all however, the clubs know that is their current parlous financial state, even more important than the $\frac{\pi}{2}$ in fee itself is the spon or allowed and site advertising income which depends up television untertaining products.

Probably the most significant straw in that particular wind came with the subsequent aurouncement from the Football League that they soon expect to clinch a large sponsorship. A spokesman said: "We have reached an advanced stage of negotiation", although he refused to continu that it would amount to film a season. That suggests that agreement with the TV companies is expected, for it is unlikely that any sponsor would sign without guaranteed TV expenses.

An eventful morning's play ended at the Crucible Theatre, Sheffield, at the Criticise Interact, Status, yesterday, with Steve Davis extending his overnight lead over Alex Higgins, the defending champion, to 10-4 in their 31-frame semi-final match of the World Professional championship, sponsored by Embassy. It is now certain that the World Professional championship will remain at the Crucible Theatre Sheffield, for at least two more years. Agreement was reached yesterday between the management of the theatre and WPBSA (Promontions), the new organization set up by the World Professional Billiards and Snooker Association. It will be played next year from April 21 to May 7.

Electric eclipses Time Charter was triumphant at Newmarket yesterday. Electric and Time Charter stamped themselves as leading contenders for the season's group one middle distance races when fighting out an exciting finish for the Jockey Club Stakes.

for the Jockey Club Stakes.

The previously unraced Jolly Bay is now one of the joint favourites for the Oaks after beating Fields of Spring in the Pretty Polly Stakes and it did not need the triumphant light of battle in John Succities eyes to of battle in John Satchite's eyes to tell us that Prince Spy was a contender for the top sprint honours this season after defying 9st 4lb in the British Sugar Silver Spoon Handicap.

The Jockey Club Stakes was a thrilling race, Billy Newnes on Time Charter looked all set for victory as the pair tracked Amyodas, Zilos and Charter looked all set for victory as the pair tracked Amyndas, Zilos and Old Country. But no sooner had the Oaks and Champion Stakes winner launched her challenge than Walter Swinburn produced Electric with a perfectly timed run on the outside. Staying on just the stronger, Electric won by a head with Amyndas a length away, third. Simply Great was beaten two furlongs from home.

Michael Stome deserves every credit for sticking to his opinion that Electric is a top-class horse and that it is only the muscular trouble in his back that has caused the Blakeney cott's disappointing efforts. Time Charter is a brilliant filly who has not yet come to her best. who has not yet come to her best, but Electric, too, is capable of improvement and their next meeting in the Coronasion Cap will be awaited with interest.

Henry Candy had stated before-hand that Time Charter would just need the race and the trainer must have been delighted by her performance. Electric was bred by Bob McCreery and is owned in permership by the former President of the Thoroughbred Breeders Association and Raymond-Clifford

Turner. Electric was handled with dash

Electric was handled with dash and judgment by Swinburn, who had also excelled on Shearwalk the day before. Stoute's stable jockey has slevays been a fine rider, but he has been operating with fire in his belly at this meeting. The Rowley Mile takes a lot of knowing and Swinburn walked the course with Doug Smith last Sunday. What the man who rode 400 winners at Newmarket told Swinburn remains a secret, but their stroll together has a secret, but their stroll together has certainly proved successful

Jeremy Tree was naturally elated by Jolly Bay's success, but would not confirm her a certain runner in the Oaks which her Dam, Juliette Marny, won in 1975. "She's very backward and ran very green. We

Four members of the British World Cup squad are competing Malcoim Pyrah, John Whitaker, Liz Edgar and Nick Skefton. They returned from the final in Vienna at the beginning of the week. Mrs. Edgar and Skelton are both riding their World Cup horses, Everest Forever and Everest If Ever, who only arrived back from Vienna on Wednesday morning, but Mr Edgar, of the Everest stud, said that both horses travelled well, and are in good form "particularly If Ever – he bucked me off on Thursday morning". are going to give her another run and then we'll see. I'm certainly not going to be rushed into rumin her," Tree said. Be that as it may th punters were obviously impressed as they backed Jolly Bay at all prices from 16-1 to 8-1 during the

on Everest If Ever. Mr Ross had a good outing at Birmingham earlier this month where he won the Grand Prix. Harvey Smith and his eldest son, Robert, are bringing six horses from Yorkshire headed by Sanyo Fairway and Sanyo Technology.

One of the younger horses at the meeting is Mrs Edgar's second ride, Domino, who is only six and was hought by the Earl of Inchcape last week.

There will be 22 foreign riders, with Hans Winkler, Germany's Olympic 1956 gold medal winner, returning after a long absence. He has been without a top-class horse for several years. His wife, Astrid will ride for Venezuela in her first visit to Hickstead.

David Asimus and Gavin Chester Prince Spy's victory was also a joy to watch. Brought with a storming run by Willie Carson the three-year-old showed class, courage and speed as he raced home two and a haif lengths clear of the lightly-weighted Miss Thames. "Make no mistake this is a proper horse," Sutcliffe said. "It takes a good animal to win off this mark in the handicap. He'll now go for races like the Duke of York Stakes, the Cork the Duke of York Stakes, the Cork and Orrery Stakes and the July Cup".

Two possible Royal Ascot two year-olds were seen in Be My Valentine and Our Dynasty. Henry Cecil's Be My Valentine lengthened cett's se my Valentine lengthened her stride impressively at the finish of the Wilbraham Maiden Stakes and is an obvious candidate for the Queen Mary Stakes at the Royal Tokyo (Reuter) - Sweden's highly-rated men's team went into their match with China like lambs to the slaughter in the world championships here yesterday. They played the Chinase in Group A without some of their best players, including the European champion Michael Applegran, and not surgrimeaning the European champion Michael Applegren, and not surprisingly lost 5-0. But there was method in their madness. By finishing second to China in the group, Sweden can avoid meeting them again until the finals. 3.30 WATERLOO AUCTION STAKES (2-y-o maidens

Apart from the Chinese, interest centred on France and South Korea. The South Koreans trounced West Germany 5-0 and France had to struggel before emerging 5-3 victors over Czechoslovakia. Yugoslavia beat the United States 5-1 in another Group A match. China are now the only undefeated team in the group. Apart from the Chinese, interest A Chinese official said yesterday that his country is against Seoul being selected as the venue for the thirty-ninth world championships in 1987. Seoul and New Delhi are both bidding for the 1987 tourna-ment with Gothenburg, already selected as the venue for the next championships in 1985. But Song championships in 1985. But Song Zong, Chima's representative at meetings being held here by the International Table Tennis Federation (TITF), said: "We are against the selection of Seoul. The other candidate, New Delhi, stems better".

Jeantot supreme

With Philippe Jeantot 500 miles due east of Antigua yesterday, holding a commanding lead over the nine remaining contenders completing the final leg of the single-handed round the world yacht race, nothing short of sinking is likely to stop the Frenchman winning this BOC-sponsored event over the last 1,750 miles to the finishing line in Barry Pickthall

His nearest rival, Bertie Reed, of South Africa, is 200 miles astern, with Richard Broadnead, of Britain, sailing the 52-foot Perseverance of Medina, and the Czech sailor. Richard Konkplski, aboard the smaller Nike III sharing third place.

There is still a bank on for the $25,000 prize money that goes to the overall winner of Class II. Francis Stokes from the United States, aboard the 39-foot Moonshine, which cuts the Tokyo taxi driver's overall advantage to 24 hours.

Hunt on for new Roach

venue By Nicholas Timmins

The coroner for the inquest on Colin Roach, the black youth who died of shotgun wounds in the entrance to Stoke Newington police station in January, was yesterday looking for a new place to hold the inquest.

The search, in which the Lord Chancellor's office has been contacted to see if other courts may be available, came after a High Court ruling that the Greater London Council had attempted to usurp the cor-oner's powers by determining that he should hold the inquest at Hackney Town Hall. Mr Justice Woolf ruled that Dr Douglas Chambers, the coroner, was perfectly entitled to decide that the inquest should be held at St Pancras Coroner's Court, rather than the larger venue in Hackney.

But the judge said that he would be happier if the hearing could be held in a larger venue, seating perhaps 100 people rather than the 50 or 60 possible at St Pancras.

Mr Raymond Kidwell OC. for the coroner, said after the judgment that Dr Chambers had been considering finding a larger place for some time. He had, however, been given no choice by the GLC's attempt to determine that the inquest should be held at Hackney. "if there is a larger court available and he has descretion then he will consider sitting in that Clerkenwell Clerkenwell magistrates' court could hold 100 people and was under consideration.

There were fears yesterday. however, that the search could delay the inquest still further.

Mr Justice Woolf said that the inquiry would be an inquest into the death only. It was right that the jury should not be subjected to undue pressure. The problems that could occur when a large number of people were present and feelings ran high had been seen recently at the Deptford fire inquest into the death of 13 young black "It is perfectly proper for the coroner not to want to run the risk of a repetition", he said.

Letter from Transvaal

Fight for survival Afrikaner fashion

"I was speaking English just now because I understand we have the London press here" Mr Fanie Botha, the South African Minister of Man-power, said in Louis Trichardt ne other night, apologizing for his temporary lapse from Afrikaans to the 400 or so National Party faithful gathered in a local schoolhalf.

English is not a tongue much spoken in Louis Trichardt, a one-street town of some 7,000 Europeans, 90 per cent of them Afrikaners. which huddles in the bushveld of the northern Transvaal beneath the southern slopes of the green and rolling hills of the Soutpansberg.

The place is named after one of the most famous of the Voortrekkers who in the 1830s inspanned their ox-wagons and led thousands of their Boer people northward away the Cape and British rule, in the remarkable up-country migration that has come to be known as the Great Trek

Louis Trichardt still has a frontier air, and its people a frontier mentality. It is a town where men are men and kaffirs are still kaffirs. Only 50 miles to the north lies the Limpopo river and what, to most Afrikaners, is the irre-deemable outer darkness of black Africa.

In the bar at the Hotel Louis, where "Oom" Gideon Pretorius has presided for more than 30 years, taking his sjambok on occasion to unruly customers, opinion runs strongly in favour of the ultraright-wing Conservative Party of Dr Andries Treumicht. The Conservatives broke away from the National Party in March of last year and now have 18 seats in Parliament.

"Look, man", says a dark-bearded farmer in shorts and knee-high socks whose property abuts the frontier with Zimbabwe, "What would you do if you had a wife and children to protect and the coon boys were just across the river? I'm not interested in politics, I'm interested in survival."

At the Conservative Party. office further down the street, where stacks of posters proclaiming "Never surrender. Vote Langley." are awaiting distribution, a frighteningly intense young man has a similar message: "If you think we are over-reacting when we worry about black rule, then just go up to the border and take a look. We can survive in South Africa only as the masters of South Africa." There is little doubt that such sentiment is widespread among the mainly conservative farmers who make up the 14,800 voters of the Soutpans-berg constituency where Mr Botha will be fighting for his political life, at a by-election on May 10 against the Conservative Party's Mr Tom Langley. It will be one of four crucial by-elections in the Transvaal on that date.

The Conservative Party is skilfully exploiting the gut-fear of many Afrikaners and conservative English-speaking whites in the Platteland constituencies of the Tran-svaal that the Government's scheme for giving paliamentary representation to the Indian mixed-blood Coloured minorities will only be the first step towards a general surrender of white control.

When Afrikaners fall out little quarter is given. Mr Botha's former party col-leagues in the Conservative Party have dredged up a hoary scandal about his personal involvement in an irrigation scheme whose large debts were written off by Parliament on his recommendation as Minister of Water Affairs more than 10 years ago. The Government has accused the party of vicious character assassination.

Trichardt's 500 Indians make of it all? They were moved to a separate "group area" two miles outside the town in the early 1970s and their businesses followed three years ago. They admit that, in terms of new facilities, they have done quite well out of the move, and seem quite indifferent to the election fervour down the Speaking of the proposed reforms, an Indian garage-owner said: "Nothing will change until we are treated as full human beings. I wouldn't say there is opposition among Indians, Just apathy.

When the soil dries up suffi-ciently and warms up a bit more, sow grass seed for new lawns, or to cover bare patches. It often happen that there are thin areas of grass where perhaps weeds or moss have been eradicated. An oversowing of, say, 1,000 of grass seed to the square yard would do a lot of good. Also when the weather eventually warms up, apply selective weedkillers to lawns; they work much better in varm weather. Whitefly are breeding lustily in greenhouses and on plants indoors Spraying with permethrin several times at 10-day intervals should control them and most other common pests. Thin shoots of herbaceous plants
